The latest addition to the admirable 'Oxford Essays.' The author is music-master at Tonbridge, and these chapters are the result of notes made and experiments tried at that school during several years. Dr. Wood covers the ground thoroughly, from a classification of the boys (the basis being notes made on the musical condition of every new boy during five years), through sing-songs, musical clubs, school choir organization, concerts, chapel services, winding up with some notes on the cultivation of good taste, and an appendix consisting of specimen programmes of concerts, organ recitals, &c. Dr. Wood has two qualities of prime importance in a task of this kind —enthusiasm and a sense of humour. His keen and commonsensible little book should be in the hands of all manner of folk who have to teach or introduce good music to a crowd. As an example of his regard for small practical points, we mention that he does not disdain to discuss the importance of looking after the proofs of concert programmes. He truly says that a bad howler will sometimes ruin an item's chance, and he cites a programme

'Covent Garden and the Royal Opera.' By Richard Northcott.

[The Press Printers, Long Acre, 15*s.*]

A new, enlarged, and revised edition of a book that appeared in 1921. It seems to contain everything that one would look for in such records. Mr. Northcott presents his facts in the plainest possible way—rather too plainly, perhaps, much of the book being cast in the unattractive form of lists and tables. A strong point is the illustrative side ; there are a hundred and sixty-one portraits of singers and conductors—'the largest number [says the author] that has appeared in any book in England or America.' Facsimiles of early playbills, &c., add to the interest. As Wisden is to the cricket enthusiast, so is this volume to the opera-goer ; and it is well-nigh indispensable to journalists, lecturers, and all whose need is for a great mass of facts in an easily consultable form. But the price seems rather stiff for a little over a hundred pages in paper covers. H. G.

'Carl Maria von Weber, seine Persönlichkeit in seinen Briefen, &c.' Compiled by Prof. D. O. Hellingham.

[Freiburg : Herder. 4 marks.]

A useful and readable compilation in which excerpts from Weber's letters, diaries, and other writings, and from the writings of his contemporaries, tell their own tale. It is all the more useful, because no collected edition of Weber's letters exists ; nor are his diaries published. M.-D. C.

'Die Lieder von C. M. von Weber.' By Dr. Max Degen.

[Freiburg: Herder. 2 marks.]

There was so far no monograph on this subject. The songs are carefully analysed from the point of view of form, harmony, and prosody. The author rightly points out that, with Weber, songs were a mere sideline, but that his contributions are not unworthy of attention. M.-D. C.

'Wilhelm Speyer der Lieder-Komponist.' By Edward Speyer.

[Munich: Drei Masken.]

Wilhelm Speyer (1790-1878) wrote several hundred songs, little known nowadays, and chamber music, which is likewise forgotten. His life, judging by the large and handsomely-illustrated volume now before us, must have been full of interest. He came into contact with Méhul and Boïeldieu, Weber and Spohr, Ries, Berlioz, Cherubini, Liszt, Marschner, and many other composers. The book contains a large number of hitherto unpublished letters from most of these, and constitutes a useful contribution to the musical history of the times. M.-D. C.

'Analyse von Chopin's Klavierwerken.' By N. Leichtentritt.

[Berlin: Max Hesse.]

This is, first and last, a book for the student of composition. Each one of Chopin's works is analysed from the rhythmical, harmonic, and structural point of view. The harmonic analyses are founded on Riemann's system, but are carried out in a way that renders them quite intelligible even to readers who are unacquainted with this system. A remarkable feature is that the form of a work is often represented by sketches, some of them purely schematic diagrams, others more boldly imaginative—e.g., the analysis of the Etude, Op. 10, No. 8, is illustrated by a couple of architectural designs with perspective all complete—or almost. M.-D. C.

'Lehrbuch der Harmonie und der Elementar Komposition.' By Johannes Schreyer. New edition.

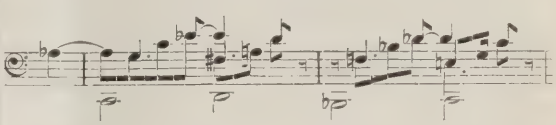
[Leipsic: C. Merseburg.]

One of Gavarni's most famous cartoons depicts an endless vista of lorettes along a Paris boulevard, and the legend reads: 'Dire que tout celà mange tous les jours: c'est ça qui donne une crâne idée de l'homme!' When I see the countless primers of harmony and composition that are put on the market—there is, as a rule, not a penny to choose between them—I likewise feel 'que ça donne une crâne idée de l'étudiant en musique.'

This particular primer, however, is not only good of its kind; it possesses distinctive features. For instance, a long quotation from Marpurg (of all people in the world) to the effect that consecutive fifths and octaves do not always offend the ear, and should therefore not be forbidden as a matter of principle.

Finding the author free from so many superstitions (he points out, for instance, that certain fifths and octaves in Beethoven's works need not be ascribed, as they are by Riemann and others, to 'misprints'), I was painfully surprised to encounter his analysis of the initial motive in Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony, in which he yields to one of the worst superstitions in trying to reduce the tonal indefiniteness of this motive to some kind of tonal order.

A musician [he writes] will mentally rectify the first two bars, conceiving them, say, as:



The very notion makes me shudder.

Music in the Foreign Press

THE GENUINE 'BORIS GODOUNOV'

In the February Revue Musicale Victor Belaiev writes:

> Prof. Paul Lamm has succeeded in discovering that 'Boris Godounov' exists under three forms: that of the original vocal score (1875); the orchestral version written in 1871 for the purposes of performance; and the actual original version of 1868-69, which contains a good deal of unpublished music. Prof. Lamm is preparing to issue this version, both in full score and in vocal score form. The published vocal score of 1875 conforms partly to the original version and partly to the orchestral version of 1871.

This is not altogether news; indeed, the existence of these three versions is referred to in the special Moussorgsky number of the Muzykalny Sovremennik (1916) by both Andrei Rimsky-Korsakov and V. Karatyghin. But the announcement that the original version is to be published will delight all Moussorgsky's admirers.

OFFICIAL ART IN SOVIET RUSSIA

In the Ménestrel (February 20), Alexander Tcherepnin writes:

> The chiefs of the Bolshevik Government make many attempts to use art for propaganda purposes. The contributions of past ages are now considered from the Socialist and Marxist point of view. The history of music is divided into three periods: the first (mediæval polyphony and up to Bach) was under the influence of feudalism; the second (greater orchestral forms, opera, symphony, &c.), under that of capitalism; the third (romanticism, impressionism), under that of the middle classes. Debussy is a prophet announcing the downfall of the bourgeoisie. In 1921 [says Tcherepnin] I was at Tiflis, then besieged by the Soviet troops. The Georgians withdrew from the town, the Red Army occupied it. We feared that looting and destruction would take place. But what happened was that the general in command ordered all the theatres to be opened forthwith, concerts to be organized, and the grimy, exhausted soldiers filled all the halls, attendance being made compulsory. . . . An attempt has been made at Moscow to organize classes of composition minus masters, the pupils instructing one another.

THE MODERN ORGAN'S SHORTCOMINGS

In the Zeitschrift für Musik (February), Erwin Zillinger, the organist of Schleswig Cathedral, writes:

> If nowadays so many musicians evince indifference—or even aversion—to the organ, it is because the organ is no longer what it should be. Three factors are to be considered: the decline of organ-playing after Bach's death; the decline of the output of organ music; and the decline of organ-building. Modern organs are not built in accordance with the true spirit of the instrument. They aim at being 'expressive' after the fashion of the orchestra, at flexibility of tone, at lending themselves to 'individual' playing. Meanwhile the finest examples of old organs are neglected and allowed to fall to pieces. Old organs were built so as to compel the organist to play organ music as it should be played. Modern organs encourage human, emotional playing, that merely reflects the earthly and transient, whereas 'organ-playing should be the expression of a will enlightened through contemplating that which is eternal.' The organs of the future must be built on new lines—that is, on quite old lines—so as to fulfil the true purpose of this king of instruments.

A SWEDISH QUEEN AND MUSIC

In the Svensk Tidskrift för Musikforskning (Nos. 3-4, 1924), A. Sandberger writes on Queen Christina and music, with particular reference to her interest in Italian opera and in Cesti's music.

NORWEGIAN FOLK-TUNES

In the Bulletin de la Société Union Musicologique (iv.-2), O. M. Sandvik gives a survey of published Norwegian folk-songs, and cursorily describes their chief idiosyncrasies. The chief sources are the collections by Ludvig Lindeman, Catharinus Elling, Olav Sande, Arne Bjorndal, Jan Halvorsen, O. M. Sandvik, and Olaf Fröysaa. A noteworthy feature is the predominance of Gregorian Modes, probably due to the influence of Catholic Church music. Another is the variability of certain intervals—fourths are often too high, sevenths too low, thirds and sixths irregular. Erik Eggers's book, 'Skalastudier' (Oslo, 1923), is a useful contribution to the study of these particularities.

CHURCH MUSIC

The Faith Press steadily continues its issue of settings of the Holy Communion Service. Two recent numbers—'Missa Sancti Baptistæ,' in the Dorian Mode, by Aubrey R. Brittain, and 'Missa Sanctæ Crucis,' by H. Cyphus—are intended for unaccompanied singing. The latter is in simple four-part harmony throughout. In the former, frequent use is made of two- and three-part writing, and occasional easy contrapuntal passages are met with. The slurring in this setting, by the way, is frequently haphazard, pauses sometimes appear over the treble part only, and in the bottom line of page 5 the bass D should be a breve. Both these works would suit choirs of quite modest resources who are looking out for something to sing unaccompanied. It should be pointed out that neither contains a setting of the Creed—Plainsong for this being presumed—and both include a nine-fold, as well as a Decalogue, Kyrie.

The Faith Press also publishes as an anthem for Lent, 'Beneath the Cross of Jesus,' from Sydney H. Nicholson's setting of the Passion, 'The Saviour of the World.' This is a well-varied treatment of a stately tune written to words by E. C. Clephane. Simple and dignified in style, its issue in this form will be welcomed by many.

An anthem for general use, 'Great God, Who, hid from mortal sight,' by Basil Harwood (Novello), is a setting of the Rev. J. Chandler's translation of the hymn, 'O luce qui mortalibus.' It is a fairly elaborate work with the organ part frequently set out on three staves. The tune—somewhat chromatic in character—is sung in the first verse by tenor (or soprano) solo, or soprano semi-chorus. In the second and fourth verses it appears in the tenor, with the other voices adding free parts, all solo or semi-chorus, the latter verse unaccompanied. The third verse is for tenors and basses, with a free organ part giving an opportunity for the use of a tuba. Relief is afforded in the fifth verse by a new melody sung by solo bass, the original tune forming the bass of the organ part. The last verse, for full chorus, is briefly developed, and the work concludes quietly. A good choir is needed.

Alfred H. Allen's setting of the Communion Service in F major (Novello) is not to be undertaken lightly. Much of the vocal writing is of a character fully to test the powers of a good church choir. The voices, moreover, are frequently left unaccompanied, the composer in fact suggesting that, if preferred, the whole Service might be sung without organ. Capable choirs, seeking for something elaborate, would find much to interest them in this setting.

Those who are acquainted with Herbert Howells's work as a composer will no doubt be keen to examine for themselves his settings for voices in unison of the Communion Service, Te Deum, Benedictus, and Jubilate, and Evening Service (Oxford University Press). Mr. Howells's methods are already familiar to many organists through his organ compositions, so they will not be unprepared for much that is unconventional in his treatment of these settings. One may question if it was really worth while to overload the score with such a variety of time-signatures. In the last twelve bars of the Nunc Dimittis, for example, occur the following: 3-2, 3-4, 3-2, 7-4, 5-4, and 3-2. Optional endings, with boys' voices in three parts, are provided in some of the movements. The melody appears in both notations G. G.

In view of the growing number of churches at which the Office of Tenebræ is celebrated, there is need for an edition that will enable the average organist and choirmaster to undertake it without having to call in advisers on various liturgical and musical points. Such an edition has now been prepared by Francis Burgess. The Office for the three evenings is issued separately. No practical point seems to have been overlooked, even the order of procession to the choir being stated in detail. The choir is told exactly what to do and when and how to do it; hence there is no risk of the solemnity of the occasion being disturbed (as has so often been the case) by somebody not knowing whether he ought to stand, kneel, or sit. The plainsong is written in modern notation, and the tones are provided with simple vocal harmony for use if desired. The Miserere is given in three settings, all of the first quality; that for Maundy Thursday being by Vittoria, for Good Friday by Allegri, and for Holy Saturday by Palestrina. Simple fa-burden settings are provided for the Benedictus. The antiphon melodies and psalm-tones are as they appear in the Latin office books. These admirable publications—which belong to the series of 'Anglo-Catholic Choir-books'—are to be had from the Society of SS. Peter and Paul, Westminster House, Great Smith Street, S.W.1. H. G.

Messrs. Novello have just published a collection of thirteen Chorales from Bach's Cantatas and Motets. The set has been admirably chosen; it rightly avoids such examples as are already available and well-known through their inclusion in popular hymnals, and it gives ample variety in mood and style. A prefatory note suggests various uses to which the Chorales lend themselves, i.e., as short unaccompanied anthems; choral items in an organ recital, especially in connection with preludes based on the tunes sung; alternative tunes to well-known hymns for special occasions; for use as preliminary exercises in the study of Bach choralism; as sight-reading material for advanced choirs; and for students in part-playing and vocal score reading. It was a happy thought to include not only the Chorale, 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure,' but also the two simple, but striking, variations from the Motet of that title. A good choir could thus make of the group an effective and fairly lengthy unaccompanied item. The whole set will be a boon to choirs of all kinds. H. G.

CHAMBER MUSIC

The opening bars of Herbert Howells's Sonata in E minor for pianoforte and violin (Oxford University Press) are hardly impressive. They suggest the Arcadian shepherd, and Howells is anything but a gentle warbler. His strength appears to be rather in bold design and vigorous rhythm. He is at his best when he can give free rein to a fancy which, like that of most moderns, is somewhat restless, but also spirited and ardent. This, of course, is purely a question of proportion. Contrast is indispensable, and, however buoyant and youthful the mood, a breathing space must be provided if we are not to disregard one of those elementary laws of composition which are never ignored with impunity. So much must be granted, and perhaps the quiet and reminiscent opening should be interpreted as a foil to the rugged strength of the other sections. It is significant in the highest degree that Howells, like Prokofiev in the recently-heard Violin Concerto, banishes the slow movement altogether and goes from a Poco allegro to an Allegro moderato, and from this to a Vivace. He has no Song of Thanksgiving, no quiet thoughts, no tender, haunting memories. Our young men have killed care, and go about with the cheerful mien of the soldier of fortune in Reade's novel who met everybody with the comforting assurance: 'Courage! Le diable est mort!' This cheerfulness is not without some anxiety, which is expressed in changes of tempi, frequent directions to performers, and also in neologisms not all of which are easily understood. What is the meaning of élato and risvegliato? For all this, the Sonata is a good piece of work, and, played (for the violin part) by Albert Sammons, to whom it is dedicated, it should not fail to make its mark.

Alfred M. Wall's Sonata in A major, for violin and pianoforte (Curwen), stands on a different plane, for it has neither the strength nor the more questionable features of Howells's work. The classical model is accepted, and if we miss the loftiness of the real classic, there is a certain Mendelssohnian glibness about this music, which is not without praiseworthy features. It runs along so easily and so smoothly that a first reading suggests both superficiality and also the possible existence of some more valuable element. Certain platitudes in the second movement are not quite enough to turn the balance on one side or the other. On the whole one feels that Wall's work would be far more attractive than it is if he had the courage to follow the advice of a great composer who urged young people to cut out ruthlessly even good things if they impeded the logical development or otherwise detracted from the effect of the whole. B. V.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC

An album of six pieces by Arthur Somervell, entitled, 'Rustic Pictures' (Joseph Williams), will be found useful for pupils approaching Lower Division standard. They are excellently written, and make a well-contrasted set. No. 1, 'The Zephyr,' is a graceful little movement in 6-8 time. The others are: 'Hobgoblin' (good practice in chords and thirds), 'On the Green' (a minuet), 'Through the Meadows,' 'The Fish in the Stream' (a capital study in rapid arpeggios divided between the hands), and 'By the Forest Gate' (Rêverie).

W. G. Whittaker's 'Six Short Pieces,' under one cover (Augener) are entitled, 'Fantastic Dance,' 'A Plaintive Song,' 'In the Style of a Folk-song,' 'Jig,' 'A Grim Old Legend,' 'Theme with Variations.' They are modern in style, and present the student with problems not to be met with in the pieces considered above. Good cantabile playing—in both hands—is frequently called for, and much depends on a skilful management of the pedal. Mr. Whittaker, it may be noted, is always very definite in his pedal indications, and pupils who are weak in a frequently neglected branch of technique will profit from a study of this interesting set of pieces. They are of about Lower Division standard.

E. Beck-Slinn's 'Four Sketches' — Capriccio, Valse Petite, Gavotte Mignonne, and Valse Caracteristique (Augener)—are fluently-written little works in two parts. They may be recommended for pupils of Elementary grade, particularly those whose playing generally is lacking in neatness and finish.

Teachers of beginners, who are looking for something fresh to use as a first book of pieces, should try 'Old Tunes for Young People,' by E. Markham Lee (Joseph Williams). These are all arranged within the compass of five notes in each hand, and are selected from both popular and classical sources. Although various keys are suggested, the only black notes introduced are an occasional F♯ and B♭. The book is attractively got up, and the type is large and clear. Needless to say, Dr. Lee has done his part excellently.

From J. H. Larway come several numbers of the Larway Student Series, by Ernest Austin. They range in difficulty between Elementary and Lower Division standard, and should prove admirable for teaching purposes. Each of the nine pieces in this series is of definite educational value, in addition to being attractive as music. Thus No. 2, 'To an Evening Primrose,' is a charming study in cantabile playing for the right hand. No. 5, 'Harebells on Banstead Downs,' is mainly concerned with graceful arpeggio figures passed from hand to hand—and so on.

Also to be commended are the four little pieces —'Hop-Scotch,' 'In a Hammock,' 'Golliwogs' Procession,' 'A short life and a merry one'— under the title 'Summer-time,' by A. Herbert Brewer (Augener). They will be found excellent for rhythm and phrasing. The first and last are the most difficult, and need nimble fingers; and No. 4 is particularly good practice in staccato and other touches. The pieces are published separately.

MUSIC FOR HARP

It is very satisfactory to note that composers no longer neglect the harp. As a solo instrument it has very obvious limitations as the sole exponent of a whole evening's programme. On the other hand, few instruments can give as much variety to a recital as two or three harp solos placed in well-chosen strategic positions. Eugène Goossens's 'Two Ballades for Harp' (Curwen) are exceedingly well-written, and, ably played, ought to be very effective. The music is so conceived for the instrument as to give us the impression that the composer is an expert performer. His music is never commonplace—so much his worst opponents must admit. And in both these Ballades his originality has had the happy result of keeping him away from the well-trodden, characteristic harp tricks, and of sending the composer to the much finer and more suggestive effects of tone and technique which have been added in comparatively recent years to the province of the instrument.

Joseph Jongen writes for the harp in a slightly more conservative style. But his 'Danse Lente' (Chester) for harp and flute has all the aristocratic charm and graciousness of Jongen's music at its best. The pianoforte can take the place of the harp if necessary. But although the composer has himself seen to it and minimised, as far as possible, the loss of colour by occasional alterations, this music seems to us conceived so well for the two instruments that it will be as wrong to play the harp part on the pianoforte as it would be to play the flute part on a fiddle. B. V.

NEW VIOLIN MUSIC

Chaminade's 'Le Matin,' for violin and pianoforte (Enoch), is characteristic of its composer's manner and mannerism. It is well within reach of players of moderate ability, and its general style corresponds to that of the singer's ballad. Originally it was written for the orchestra, but apparently conductors have not taken too kindly to it, and so far as we know there has been no performance in this country. The present arrangement is the work of the author. It gives the impression of music conceived for the pianoforte, or for pianoforte and violin, rather than for the orchestra, which may mean skill in transcribing and may also mean an original less felicitous than the arrangement. B. V.

STRING MUSIC

The four short pieces by Hugo Anson (Curwen), entitled 'Tranquility' (which we old fogies spell with two 'l's'), are not quite as tranquil as their title suggests. Tranquillity implies a quiet, satisfied mind, and, for all their harmlessness and simplicity, these brief pieces do not set our mind at rest. Peace, after all, is not synonymous with coma. We may reduce 'all that's made to a green thought in a green shade,' as the poet suggests; but both the thought and the shade are essential to perfect peace, and we can find little trace of either in these pieces of Mr. Anson's.

The arrangements of 'Jubilee Songs' of American Negroes for 'cello, by Arthur Benjamin (Curwen), may interest 'cello players who are also ardent admirers of American negroes. To us the main point is whether negro songs (jubilee or not) should be arranged at all. It is a point which could only be discussed at length during the 'silly season,' along with the ever-recurring topic of 'Should curates marry?' No doubt curates are better unmarried, and the song of the negro minstrel is better left in its original state. But curates will marry—now and again—and, we suppose, the negro song, for all that we may say, will be touched up so as to be available for young violinists and 'cellists. And this being the case, the present arrangements will serve. B. V.

STRING ORCHESTRA

Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the 'Londonderry Air' for string orchestra and harp (Curwen's Edition) is more elaborate than the average arrangement, yet in the main it is the stuff a popular audience expects from strings and harp—vigorous swinging of bow and arpeggios on the climax. The first statement of the theme is assigned to a solo violin—also a good popular touch, but, of course, perfectly legitimate. The Harty scheme is briefly this: (1) melody on the G string solo fiddle; (2) Tutti on the A string (or A string latitude); then on the E, and so home in excelsis—i.e., the top E harmonic for the solo fiddle. It will be suggested, no doubt, that the lower strings do not get a 'look in,' and that the range of colour is consequently somewhat limited. But the possibilities of a string orchestra are without limit, and, a choice being inevitable, Harty's is perhaps as good as another. If this version does not impress one as imaginative and poetical, it is certainly practical and effective. B. V.

A GLANCE AT SOME SILBERMANN ORGANS

By J. M. Duncan

'The time is not far distant,' says Schweitzer, 'when the last of our beautiful Silbermann organs will be replaced, or renovated beyond recognition.' Recollecting this prophecy, the writer took the opportunity of a recent visit to Saxony to track down a few of the best remaining Silbermann organs, and to examine them on the spot.

Freiberg, half-way between Dresden and Chemnitz, is a typical old Saxon town, which looks much as Leipsic must have looked when the twenty little Bachs were romping in St. Thomas's Churchyard. The principal church possesses the earliest large organ built by Silbermann. It was designed by Kuhnau, Bach's predecessor at Leipsic, and opened by him in August, 1714. On this organ, through the kindness of the clergyman, I was last January permitted to play for a whole afternoon. It remains exactly as Silbermann left it—except that, providentially, the original bellows has been replaced by a motor.

There are three keyboards with a compass of four octaves, omitting the lowest C sharp, and a pedal of two octaves. Thus, although I found it included in a recent recital programme, Bach's Toccata in F cannot be played without alteration; and no doubt Bach was himself often obliged to transfer the upper portions of the pedal solo to the manuals, and to modify other passages. The manual keys are, of course, black with white sharps; the pedals, however, are not, as in old English organs, narrower than ours, but actually rather wider, so that to reach the uppermost C requires nearly the same stretch of leg as to reach our modern F. The 'white' pedal keys are somewhat shorter than ours, and the raised notes about half the length. Nevertheless, though Schweitzer seems to question the fact, it is perfectly possible to employ the heel as well as the toe, even in the pedal solo of the F major Toccata.

The touch of the keys proved surprisingly light. In the two subsidiary manuals it differs little from that of our own tracker organs. The touch of the Hauptwerk (Great) is heavier, strong springs being necessary to guard against any risk of ciphers. But even when the three manuals are all coupled together, no prohibitive physical effort is required even in passage-work. The writer played Bach for three hours—forgetting all about lunch—in a warmed church, without perspiration or any of the other symptoms of exhaustion of which Burney's diary makes complaint.

The pitch of the organ is a whole tone above ours, and the tuning is still 'unequal.' The writer had not previously been so fortunate as to meet with a large organ so tuned, and the result was unexpected. Modulation into more than three sharps or flats was hideous, and the Prelude of the 'St. Matthew' Passion had to be speedily called off. On the other hand, one could not, contrary to expectation, detect any special merit in the primary keys, so it seems that the advantage brought by the introduction of equal temperament has involved no corresponding loss.

The drawstops are formidable objects. The knobs resemble the black king in a set of very large chessmen, and are fixed to baulks of timber about an inch square, which need to be hitched down after being drawn. It is a greater physical effort to prepare for a fugue than to play it; and at the end of a loud piece, when the thumbs instinctively seek the pistons, it comes as a shock to realise that one must now face the exertion of pushing the stops home. There are no pedal couplers; therefore in a pedal solo only the actual pedal pipes are available for use. To couple or uncouple the subsidiary manuals the whole keyboard must be moved an inch or so in or out of gear. The organ is, of course, innocent of composition pedals or of a Swell.

The following is the specification, the stops being given as they stand:

¶ Pedal.

Two defects in this specification will be noticed. First, as usual in the 18th century, the Great contains no 4-ft. flute; secondly, there is no soft pedal 8-ft. stop; consequently the writer found it impossible to arrange a satisfactory registration for Bach's E flat Sonata.

The wood and metal 8-ft. and 4-ft. flutes are mellow and good, the wooden pipes particularly so, but to modern ears the chorus is too strong, the full Brustwerk being intolerable uncoupled. The reeds are of course rough and weak, and in no way comparable with modern English work. Bach's own registration of 'Gottes Sohn ist kommen,' from the 'Orgelbüchlein,' did not sound at all well. Though a little overpowering at first, the full organ becomes acceptable in time, and one realises that when Bach gave the direction 'pro organo pleno' he meant 'full organ,' and not something else. It was interesting to observe that in playing a four-part Chorale on the full organ it proved very effective to follow the old method of using all the fingers of both hands at once, and in addition to double the tenor part with the right foot, notwithstanding the 32-ft. Principal. Thus the double-pedal passage at the end of Bach's Prelude in D, which proves such a stumbling-block upon the elephantine open wood pipes of English organs, here sounds quite easy and natural.

The Freiberg organ is Silbermann's earliest effort, and the well-known organ in the Court Church at Dresden is his latest, dating from 1754. Its specification and construction are almost identical with those of its predecessor of forty years earlier, showing how promptly the builder's methods reached maturity and how little improvement on them was necessary as time went on. The later instrument has an additional 16-ft. principal and 16-ft. reed on the Hauptwerk—there is no manual 16-ft. reed at Freiberg—which serve to improve and solidify the full organ. As against this advance, the pedal in the Court Church organ lacks any soft stop whatever, either of 16-ft. or of 8-ft. tone. The manual compass is taken four notes higher—to E. The pitch was originally a minor third lower than at Freiberg, that is to say, a semitone below our own. It was raised to normal a few years since. The tuning was, apparently, 'equal' from the beginning. The original bellows is still in use. The six levers are worked by the whole weight of two men, three levers to each, the fall being about 4-ft. Consequently the writer was unable to try the organ himself, the operators having already tackled High Mass, and being at the time unwilling any further to exert themselves. The woodwork of the case is still coated with the dirty green paint so dear to the decorating trade of the baroque period. In fact, the whole place of worship reeks of Serene Highness and powdered wigs, and is a characteristic temple of 18th-century State religion.

Though Schweitzer seems to take for granted that any restoration of a Silbermann organ is bound to spoil it, fortunately such is not always the case. The organ in the Frauenkirche at Dresden, built in 1736, was carefully modernised in 1911. All the old work, including all the Mixtures, was preserved; the additions were insignificant—a few soft, modern stops. The reeds were re-voiced, but not more heavily winded, and all the best mechanical devices were introduced. To the result the epithet 'magnificent' can for once be fitly given, and this splendid instrument may deservedly be given a place alongside the finest English organs, such as Hill's at Beverley and Harrison's at York. True, the brilliant high-pressure English reeds are wanting; on the other hand, the multiplication of small pipes produces another species of brilliance which English organs do not now possess, while moving basses are wonderfully vitalized by the pedal 6-rank Mixture, which gives the player the same kind of joy in life as the driver of a very good car experiences when climbing a steep hill.

A study of these old German organs throws light on Bach's own registration. Effects could be secured either by changes of keyboard, or by the coupling and uncoupling of the subsidiary manuals, the latter operation being quite a feasible one for the performer whenever a good beat's rest could be had. But even if two assistants were employed, one on either side, it scarcely seems as if they could do more than look after the provision of suitable basses to the manuals, the difficulty of moving the clumsy stops while a performance was in progress being prohibitive, except on a small scale. Therefore those who wish to play Bach's organ music as he played it himself, must confine themselves to such changes of tone-colour as can be obtained by the means here indicated. On the other hand, the cylinder Swell, as handled by the admirable artist at the Frauenkirche, produced undeniably excellent results in the 'Wedge' and the A minor.

The organ is often called the king of instruments. The big battalions of the modern orchestra have conquered part, possibly the greater part, of its kingdom. But two hundred years ago, when orchestras barely numbered a score of players, a Silbermann organ in the hands of a Bach must have enraptured its audience through the mere volume of its sound, and even to our jaded ears still has a certain characteristic message to proclaim.

A NOTE ON BACH'S ORGAN AT ARNSTADT

The writer took the opportunity of passing through Thuringia to visit Arnstadt, where Bach held his first appointment. The old organ, by J. F. Wender, has long ago been rebuilt, but the console is preserved in the town museum, along with one or two other Bach souvenirs. There are two manuals of forty-nine notes to D, and the pedal also reaches D. The lowest C sharp is wanting. The keys are white, with black sharps, like ours. The touch is distinctly heavier than Silbermann's, and the pedals shorter, so that any systematic heel-work would have been impracticable. Of the musical capacity of this organ it is naturally impossible to speak; but in St. Severus's Church at Erfurt—the smaller of the familiar twins—there is an apparently very similar instrument built by the same maker ten years later, and intact except that several of the larger Principal pipes were commandeered during the War. If for this reason it is scarcely fair to judge the chorus, yet it can still be perceived that the individual stops are of very poor quality and greatly inferior to Silbermann's work. If the Arnstadt organ was no better, the pride which the citizens are said to have felt in it seems scarcely to have been deserved. At Erfurt, as at Freiberg, the pitch is a tone above ours, and this was therefore probably the standard local pitch in Bach's earlier days.

Of the Bach organs at Mühlhausen, Weimar, and Leipsic it appears that nothing now survives.

THE CHOIR-TRAINERS' LEAGUE

A meeting of the above was held on February 21 at St. Magnus the Martyr, London Bridge, when Capt. Francis Burgess gave a helpful and interesting lecture on 'Plainsong Psalms and their Accompaniment.' He prefaced his subject with a review of the Gregorian Tones from the earliest period, and showed how, in the course of development, they had changed from their original elaborate and ornate character to the simple form now commonly used. The modern chant, with its fixed rhythm (producing monotony), was, he said, the least suitable to the Psalms; whereas the Gregorian Tones were capable of many varying forms, and by their rhythmical freedom avoided monotony. Illustrations at the organ were given of the different types of accompaniment suitable to the various tones, and the lecturer offered the following suggestions: Let your accompaniment be characteristic of good taste and intelligence; keep it diatonic and in the same tonality; do not use any note that cannot be used in the melody; be sparing with the pedals; movement of chords must be governed by rhythm of words. He specially appealed to organists to give serious attention to legato-playing—a method essential for the purpose advocated in the lecture.

ST. MAGNUS THE MARTYR, LONDON BRIDGE

The organ at this Church has recently been reconstructed, enlarged, and re-voiced by Messrs. R. Spurden Rutt, of Leyton, and is now a three-manual of forty-nine stops. The instrument was originally built by Abraham Jordan, in 1712, and is noteworthy as being the first to contain a Swell pedal. An advertisement in the Spectator, of February 8, 1712, states that the organ contains 'four setts of keys, one of which is adapted to the art of emitting sounds by swelling the notes, which never was in any organ before; the instrument will be publicly opened on Sunday next, the performance by Mr. John Robinson.' The effect of 'swelling the notes' was obtained by the insertion of a sliding shutter in front of the box containing the pipes. The shutter was balanced by weights, and moved by levers connected by a piece of wood shaped like a horse's head. The device thus became known as the 'nag's head swell.' It need hardly be said that the working of this clumsy affair required a good deal of strength and skill. At the re-opening of the organ on February 17, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson gave a recital, his programme including Stanley's Voluntary in G, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Vaughan Williams's Prelude on 'Lovely,' Blow's Air in G, and Parry's Prelude on the 'Old 104th.' He also improvised, taking for theme Robinson's familiar chant in E flat—an appropriate choice, as Robinson was not only one of Mr. Nicholson's predecessors at the Abbey, but was also organist at St. Magnus for fifty years. A complete account of this historic organ may be had from the Verger of St. Magnus, the proceeds of the sale being devoted to the restoration of the beautiful organ case. (No price is marked on our copy, but presumably sixpence will not be far wrong.) The booklet is written by Mr. J. T. Lightwood, with additional notes by Mr. C. N. Waterhouse. We are indebted to it for the particulars of the organ given above.

WESTMINSTER CATHEDRAL RECITALS.

The present series ends on April 2, when Mr. Ambrose P. Porter (the newly-appointed organist of Lichfield Cathedral) will be the player. His programme will include a couple of Bach Chorale Preludes; Bubeck's Fantasia in F sharp, Reger's 'Moment Musical' and Toccata; Tombelle's 'La Nativité'; Willan's Prelude and Fugue in C minor, and his own tone-poem on 'Veni Emmanuel,' Communion on 'Adoro te,' and Fantasia on 'St. Magnus.'——On May 7 a special recital will be given by M. Marcel Dupré, whose programme will consist of the first movement of his Passion Symphony, three Bach Chorale Preludes, the 'St. Anne' Fugue, and an improvisation. The last-named item will fill the second half of the programme, and will consist of a Passacaglia, Three Chorales, (a) ornamental, (b) contrapuntal, and (c) canonic, and a Triple Fugue. A theme for the Passacaglia, another for the Chorales, and the three for the Fugue, will be handed to M. Dupré at the interval.

ST. GEORGE'S, HANOVER SQUARE

The bi-centenary of this Church was celebrated from March 11 to 25. At the long list of services the music included settings by Beethoven in C (with orchestra), Walmisley in D minor, Stanford in C, Harwood in A flat, and Byrd (Fauxbourdon); and anthems by Parry, Wesley, Greene, Holst, and Bach. Very appropriately one of the voluntaries was an orchestral performance of a Handel 'Concerto Grosso.' During his residence at Brook Street, Handel attended St. George's.

Dr. M. P. Conway, sub-organist of Wells Cathedral, has been appointed to Chichester Cathedral, in succession to the late Dr. J. F. Read. Dr. Conway was for nine years organist at All Saints', Eastbourne, and for four years at St. Andrew's, Wells Street. He is an excellent recitalist, who is not afraid of going off the beaten track in framing his programmes.

Organ 'storms' are such time-honoured objects of mirth that we should not mention the following but for its containing novel features. Called, rather superiorly, 'An Ocean Tempest,' it was played at Colchester the other day, and (as the East Anglian Times tells us) was descriptive of 'the feelings and emotions of ships' passengers in storm and calm, leading from a graceful barcarolle [what has a barcarolle to do with mid-ocean?] and the heralding of the approach of the storm, to a grand climax.' So far it is on conventional lines, save for that venturesome gondola song. The spice of novelty which saved this Ocean Tempest from being merely an ordinary storm was the introduction of a ship's bell and siren. The addition of such realistic touches makes us wonder when the limit will be reached. If a ship's bell and siren, why not the human voice, with a few seaman-like orders? As this particular recital appears to have taken place in a concert-hall, it might have been possible to go even farther, and give more definite expression to some of those 'emotions of ships' passengers in storm.' Mere organ-tone is too vague, whereas a muffled cry of 'Steward . . . .'

A notable recital of modern Church music was given on March 11 at Clapham Congregational Church by the regular choir of twenty-one boys and fourteen men. The programme included Holst's Two Psalms and 'Turn back, O man,' R. G. H. Greene's 'To music bent is my retired mind,' Gretchaninov's 'The Cherubic Hymn,' Stanford's 'Glorious and powerful God,' Parry's 'I know that my soul hath power,' Ireland's 'Greater love hath no man,' Charles Wood's 'Hail! Gladdening Light,' and Balfour Gardiner's 'Evening Hymn.' Mr. Reginald Redman was at the organ, and played Parry's Prelude on 'St. Anne,' Frank Bridge's Andante con moto, and Karg-Elert's 'Pastorale, Recitativo, and Chorale.' Mr. Henry F. Hall conducted.

Mr. Ralph Morgan has been presented with a cheque in recognition of his services to Bristol music in general, and to St. Mary Redcliff in particular. Canon F. N. Bateman Champain, Vicar of St. Mary Redcliff, in making the presentation, highly praised Mr. Morgan's work; Mr. F. H. C. Barnard expressed the gratitude of the hosts of Bristolians who had enjoyed the organ recitals which had been a regular feature of St. Mary's for the past thirteen years; and Mr. A. S. Warrell, on behalf of his brother professionals, paid a warm tribute to Mr. Morgan's public-spirited activities.

Mendelssohn's 'Athalie' was finely sung in Durham Cathedral on March 8 by a choir of a hundred, with string and organ accompaniment. The soloists were Mr. E. H. Knight, Mr. J. R. Cogan, and boys of the choir. There was a crowded congregation. Mr. C. B. Maude was at the organ, and the Precentor, the Rev. A. D. Culley, conducted.

The organ at the Wesleyan Church, Gresford, has been restored by Mr. Henry Poyser, of Chester, and was re-opened on March 4, Mr. H. P. Bury giving a recital, and playing Mendelssohn's sixth Sonata, Bach's 'St. Anne' Fugue, Boëllmann's 'Gothic Suite,' Franck's A minor Choral, &c.

A pointer in the matter of municipal music: The Herne Bay Urban District Council has engaged the local choral society (hon. conductor, Mr. A. A. Hodgkinson) to sing 'Elijah' at the Grand Pier Pavilion on Good Friday.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have just built an organ for St. Michael's, Huyton, near Liverpool—a two-manual of twenty-one stops.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson's new Passiontide Cantata, 'The Saviour of the World,' will be sung at St. John's, Wilton Road, S.W., on Good Friday evening, at 8.

Letters to the Editor

NOTATION OF THE HORN: SOME ALTERED MEANINGS

Sir,—It is with reluctance that I reply further to Mr. Wotton, seeing that he scarcely veils his contempt for practical experience, when it runs counter to his opinions. Mr. Pegge's playing, which he cannot have heard, is 'slovenly'; Borsdorf's information on the performance of Wagner's parts is mere 'table-talk'; and I am rebuked for having quoted it—although Mr. Wotton himself puts forward M. Pénable as the adviser of Widor, and in his last letter invokes Dr. Lyon, merely on the strength of certain alleged conversations with unnamed players, both questions and answers being unknown.

It must be jolly to feel oneself able to write on so technical a subject without practical acquaintance with, or concern for, the mechanism involved, but such feats are not for every one. And where there is no agreement on fundamentals, it becomes almost impossible to compress one's reply into a moderate compass, and still less to do justice to the great amount of research and valuable information that Mr. Wotton's article exhibits.

To turn to Wagner: Mr. Wotton contends that the notes marked with + differ in 'Tristan' from those in 'The Mastersingers,' because in his instruction in the latter score Wagner has added the direction stark anzublasen, which does not appear in 'Tristan'; and he invites me to draw my own deductions from the scores. Confining myself to these two operas, I have done so; I take 'The Mastersingers' first. Wagner's instruction does not accurately reflect the contents of his score, because in at least five places (II., 123; III., 19, 74, 149-50) a + is placed over notes marked p and without any stress at all. Further, as regards all the other marked notes, the direction to blow them strongly is mere surplusage, because the score itself contains every dynamic indication required for their performance. Wagner, who perhaps did not foresee the advent of Mr. Wotton, would have been well advised to confine his instruction to the form used in 'Tristan'; if he had done so, nothing would have been lost in performance and a rock of offence would have been removed. Nor can I agree that stark anzublasen is the precise equivalent of 'cuivrer'; as has been pointed out, the latter, correctly used, requires a well-marked sforzando and is possible even in piano passages, but it does not indicate a simple unstressed forte or fortissimo. Wagner uses the 'cuivré' effect often enough, but it is deducible from his stress marks, by no means an invariable adjunct to his stopped notes, even when forte.

In the several horn parts of 'Tristan,' Wagner puts a + over 88 notes (subject to unintentional errors of computation). Of these 20 are marked f or ff, and I regard some 48 more as being also intended to be played in the modern manner, either because they form the climax to a crescendo of open notes, or are stressed, or are notes which the hand-hornist would have closely stopped. It is impossible to give reasons for one's belief in all these cases or, if it were, to make them intelligible without aural illustration. I can only say that I have considered them all carefully, and do not think that any player who had made a close study of the hand-horn would be found seriously to disagree with me.

As regards the remaining twenty notes, some of which have been given the benefit of the doubt, a few are of necessity what Mr. Wotton calls 'good' stopped notes. This is the case with those on pp. 559-60 of the score (his Ex. 9); here the player has no alternative, because the 'bad' stopped notes are ineffective and not made use of at that pitch. Some passages do present a real difficulty, particularly the horn chords on pp. 349-50. While I think the half-dozen closed notes in them are 'bad,' the opposite opinion might reasonably be held as regards some of them.

To summarise matters, my response to Mr. Wotton must be that I see no ground for differentiating the stopped notes in these two operas on the strength of a direction which would apply to nearly a fourth of the notes in 'Tristan' and does not apply to all the notes in 'The Mastersingers.' Any difference there is concerns merely a minority of the notes in the former opera. If Wagner's intention in introducing those stopped sounds into 'Tristan' was to imitate the general style and smoothness of the natural horn (for which he relied on the skill of his performers) he set about it for the most part very badly. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that his real object was to obtain the contrast of tone-quality which is satisfactorily achieved by modern artists?

Mr. Wotton will have none of Richter; but Richter was the pioneer of numerous conductors who have come to London, imbued with the spirit of Bayreuth, to show us how Wagner should be played. My inquiries have not led to the discovery of any conductor who has required the stopped notes in 'Tristan' to be played as Mr. Wotton wishes, and in some instances have led to evidence to the contrary. Seeing the care that has been devoted at Bayreuth and elsewhere to the due presentation of Wagner's scores, the point could hardly have escaped attention.

Reference has been made to the 'good' and 'bad' stopped notes. The expression is not mine, and I only adopt it for the sake of brevity. Both classes are generally used on the valve-horn, according to the pitch of the note, but some players do not employ the 'bad' notes at all for producing stopped effects. Stopping is a peculiar thing, dependent on such factors as the width and conformation of the hand, and the calibre of the tube; and every player has therefore to do what suits him best, his first object being to keep his stopped notes in tune. Is Mr. Wotton certain, when he hears a stopped phrase, that he can tell what method the performer is using? If so, he has the advantage over me. The two methods of stopping do give different results, which can easily be detected when the same man delivers a phrase by each in succession; but, when one is heard alone in the orchestra, without a standard of comparison, it is at times very difficult to decide which it is. More than once I have been uncertain how a player sitting next to me has stopped his closed notes and have had to ask him. If then the difference can be made so trifling, is it not hypercritical to insist that all should conform to the same method in any given work, under pain of being accused of slovenliness?

One other point: the fact that Mr. Forsyth says that the French mark certain stopped and forced notes as 'cuivrées' does not necessarily mean that the term is confined to such notes. Whether he does, or does not, consider that that is the case, I cannot say, but it looks as if he had not addressed his mind to considering the full extent of the meaning of 'cuivrer.'—Yours, &c.,

W. F. H. Blandford.

THE ALBERT HALL ORGAN

Sir,—What is the good of it?

Town councillors are very fond of providing splendid organs, and leaving them to be looked at. Our silent organs are one of the curiosities of civilization. This idiosyncrasy is by no means confined to town councillors; it is shared by other controllers of public halls. Thus, Queen's Hall has a dumb organ, built about thirty years ago, and has orchestral arrangements of organ music made by a past organist and conducted by a past organist, with the organ silent in the background. This organ has suffered from atrophy, and has now been overhauled—to enable it to spend another quarter of a century of silence.

As the action of town councillors in putting in dumb organs has no reason behind it, it must be instinctive. A beaver in captivity will build a dam, though there is no water and it will not be used; similarly, a town council will build an organ which is to be useless. Ordinary instinct depends on the past, and town councillors have had no past history involving large organs. A town councillor may be a higher creation than a beaver, and his instinct may depend on the future, so that he instinctively prepares organs against the days when organ music shall come into its own.

The original Albert Hall organ was built half-a-century ago; but, so far as I know, there has never been an Albert Hall organist. In the 'nineties there were some sporadic recitals by various players, and recently there has been a twenty minutes' recital before a concert, while people got into their places for the coming music. The idea of having a concert while people got into their places for an organ recital does not seem to have been tried. The organ has also been frequently used by the Royal Choral Society for accompaniment. The original instrument, one of the best of its time, was wasted. We now have an Albert Hall organ, again of the best of its time—is it, too, to be wasted?

To make an organ valuable it must be played, and played as well as possible. In America, where also there are dumb organs, four ladies offered to give recitals on a large instrument in return for practice. Four lady organists might give recitals at the Albert Hall, but the scheme does not sound quite satisfactory. A good organ with a bad player, and a bad organ with a good player, are both poor. Though such quantities cannot be measured accurately, the value of a recital may be taken as the product of the values of the player and of the organ. For a given total expense this means that the best result is when the costs of the organ and organist are equal. This works out very reasonably. For instance, if a church can spend £200 a year on its organist and organ, it will get the best result by paying £100 for an organist and, say, £2,000, or £100 a year capitalised, for the organ. This assumes charges for practices to cover maintenance. According to this rule churches pay too little for their organists; and it would be wiser to have smaller organs with better players. Coming to the Albert Hall: if the organ is worth, say, £20,000, or £1,000 a year, and costs £250 for upkeep, the most efficient combination indicates an organist at £1,250. Suppose a first-rate organist, perhaps young in years, were chosen by the method by which Mr. Ellingford so fitly came into his own, he would have a career open to him in making the Albert Hall recitals world-famous. He could earn a good income while constituting the organ the main business of his life. Giving a hundred recitals a year, the average takings after paying other expenses would have to be £25—which is not much.

Here, however, we are up against a difficulty which is not peculiar to the Albert Hall, and that is that organ recitals are not taken seriously. The worst offenders are organists themselves. They are content to play to people who value their recitals at a few pence, while pianists of less ability, violinists of still less musicianship, and singers often of none, would never dream of performing except to people paying at least ten times as much. Even those musical papers whose editors are organists devote space to pianoforte, violin, or song-recitals, and choral concerts of no importance whatever, but give no critical accounts of organ recitals. Until organists realise that people value purchases by what they have to pay for them, the organ recital will never take its proper place in the musical world.

Leaving this broad question aside, the Albert Hall authorities have very special difficulties. They are bound by a charter. I do not know its nature, but believe they may not do anything that looks sound commercially for fear it might not pay. Then they are hampered by a large and rather unmanageable body of permanent seat-holders—of whom I am one.

No one can blame the management. Every one knows the manager is able, experienced, and energetic. The council, made up of important people, gives valuable time and energy. Not only that; its individual members have already subscribed a sum getting on towards four figures towards the organ, so their heart is in it. Yet here we have the record of a valuable organ with half-a-century of uselessness, and now a still better organ with a prospect of another fifty years' silence.

The intention may be to have occasional recitals by various organists until the interest dies down. This is a hopeless prospect.

There are two or three possible courses. One is the appointment of a first-rate organist who has his name to make, and to charge on the eccentric assumption that to hear a good performance is worth more than a few coppers. If the charter forbids this, why not get it altered? There can be no one to oppose a Bill for enabling the Albert Hall to go ahead. If nothing can be done on these lines, there is another scheme. Recently a company was proposed to buy an elaborate and very modern 'Positive,' and to engage an eminent organist who would tour the 'halls.' If such a proposal seemed reasonable, surely it would be possible for such a company to secure the exclusive recital use of the Albert Hall organ, to engage an organist, and to provide worthy recitals on a rational basis.—Yours, &c.,

'PACKINGTON'S POUND'

SIR,—Probably in the whole range of English ballad-tunes none is better known than that which goes by the curious name of 'Packington's Pound.' The tune is to be found in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book' and in 'A New Book of Tablature' (1596), but, in Ben Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fair' (1614), Nightingale, the ballad singer, sings a song, 'My masters and friends, and good people draw near,' to the tune of 'Paggington's Pound.' Let me quote the first verse :

'My masters and friends and good people draw near,
And look to your purses, for that I do say ;
And though little money in them you do bear,
It costs more to get than to lose in a day.
You oft have been told,
Both the young and the old,
And bidden beware of the cut purse so bold.'

Now the outstanding part of this attribution of the tune of 'Packington's Pound' to a certain Sir John Packington, knighted in 1587, is that there is no evidence to connect the 'lusty Packington,' who wagered that he would swim from Westminster to Greenwich for the sum of £3,000, but was prevented from making the hazardous attempt by the personal intervention of Queen Elizabeth, 'who had particular tenderness for handsome fellows.'

Musical historians have been pleased to accept this explanation as authentic, but in 1906 Mr. J. F. R. Stainer propounded a new theory as to 'Why "Packington's Pound"?' Mr. Stainer wrote an interesting article in the Musical Times (April, 1906), explaining that though there was nothing in the career of the reputed Sir John Packington (who died in 1607) to explain the affix 'Pound,' yet there was an earlier Sir John Packington (who may have been associated with the tune) who was knighted in 1545, and died in 1560.

To my mind, the whole controversy resolves itself into a misreading of the word 'Pound' for 'Round.' Thus, the tune of 1596, 1614, and 1634, was, in reality, 'Paggington's Round,' not 'Pound.'

The tune quoted by Ben Jonson, and sung, as he states, to the tune of 'Paggington's Pound,' is in the exact measure of the 1596 melody, because Cokes, when referred to as to the rhythm of the tune, sings :

'Fa, la la la, la la la, fa, la la la.'

Thus, we are certain that the 'Packington's Pound' of 1596 is the same tune as the 'Paggington's Pound' of 1614.

Chappell, in his 'Collection of National English Airs' (1838), gives a clue to the real origin of the tune, for he says that though the tune in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book' is called 'Packington's Pound,' yet, Ben Jonson calls it 'Paggington's Pound,' probably from 'Thomas Paggington who was one of the musicians retained in the service of the Protector Somerset on the death of Henry VIII. (1547), and was probably a country dance composed by him.'

From a recent investigation of old Elizabethan ballads I have arrived at the conclusion that 'Packington's Pound' is in reality a corruption of 'Paggington's Round.' Proof of this is in the ballad of 'Jonas,' licensed to William Griffith, in 1562-63, and in the ballads of 'Ye story of Jonas' (1567-68) and 'The myssedeades of Jonas' (1569-70). Edward Allde's 'History of Jonas,' printed in 1615, is directed to be sung 'to the tune of "Paggington's Round,"' —in the same metre as that given as 'Packington's Pound.'

Therefore it may be concluded that the name of the tune known as 'Packington's Pound' should, in reality, be 'Paggington's Round.' All that remains is to identify Paggington, and, again, Chappell was on the right track in identifying him with one of the Royal musicians of Queen Elizabeth.

Who was Thomas Paggington? Fortunately, The, King's Musick,' by Henry Cart de Lafontaine (1909), comes to our aid. In the account of liveries, &c., at the coronation of Edward VI., February 20, 1547, the name of Thomas Pagington appears among 'the King's Majesty's musicians.' His name also appears in a warrant for livery on December 7, 1555; March 16, 1557; Michaelmas, 1558; April 18, 1559; and on various other dates up to the year 1585. From other official sources we learn that Thomas Pagington died on August 25, 1586.

We may safely conclude that 'Packington's Pound' is a corruption of 'Pagington's Round,' and that this Round was composed by Thomas Pagington about the year 1560. There are ballads set to it in 1659, 1685, 1687, 1697, and in D'Urfey's 'Pills,' and its popularity may be gauged from the fact that Gay selected it for one of the tunes in 'The Beggar's Opera' (1728), set to the words, 'Thus gamesters united in friendship are found,' while Dean Swift used it for several ballads in 1710-20.—Yours, &c.,

MEN'S SONGS AND WOMEN SINGERS

SIR,—Referring to the recording by a well-known soprano of 'I attempt from love's sickness to fly,' 'Discus,' in your March issue writes, 'Surely this is a man's song?'

I believe I am right in saying this song was composed by Purcell for a woman's voice—that of the Queen Zempoalla in the play 'The Indian Queen,' by Sir Robert Howard and Dryden.

While agreeing that women should not, as a rule, sing music written for men, may I timorously suggest that this particular song is suitable for a male or a female voice.

ELGAR AND MANCHESTER

Sir,—Even though 'Falstaff' and (so far as I can ascertain) the second Symphony have not yet been performed at Manchester, and the first Symphony and 'The Apostles' have been given twice in fifteen and twenty years respectively, there are in this city quite a number of people who are possessed with the apparently erroneous idea that Elgar is a composer worth bothering about. Occasionally I come to the painful conclusion that we Elgar-lunatics are lunatics after all, and that we are on the wrong tack; but a glance at almost any page of an Elgar score brings me back to my senses at once. I have to read Elgar, as there does not seem to be much chance of hearing him here; and as you and Mr. Neville Cardus so aptly put it, this is about as satisfying as going into a restaurant when you are hungry and reading the menu. At the beginning of the season it was announced that Mr. Catterall would play the Violin Concerto at the Hallé Concert on January 22. What joy! I had not heard it—nor have I yet. In the programme of the preceding concert Mr. Catterall was still mentioned in connection with the Elgar, while on the page giving the programme of the concert in question, the Beethoven Concerto was substituted. Last season at least two of Elgar's works which were mentioned in the prospectus were scratched. Disappointing, is it not?

My real object in writing to you is to voice the desire of many for a sound, comprehensive book on our greatest composer. Mr. Newman's little work takes us only to 'The Apostles.' There is no book which treats of the Symphonies, the Concertos, or the chamber music. I forgot—there is one, which I read a year or so ago. I could not imagine that a publisher would print such an appalling display of bad grammar. It was teeming with split infinitives and false constructions; every other composition was described as 'colourful.' I learnt that several works were dedicated to 'A. M. D. G.,' and a number of the musical examples were incorrect. I was glad that I had not bought the copy I read, and sorry that some one else had. I fancy that a book on the lines of Heseltine's 'Delius' would meet a long-felt want, and I know of two admirers of Elgar who are eminently suited to the task of writing it—Mr. Harvey Grace and Mr. Ernest Newman. I commend the idea to either of these two writers, feeling sure that they will earn the everlasting gratitude of other admirers of Elgar if they take it up.—Yours, &c.,

MUSIC IN THE CINEMA

Sir,—I was delighted to read Mr. Clarke's letter in the February issue of the Musical Times, relating to the use of first-rate music in the cinema. I played for over a year at our local picture house, and used music by the greatest of the great—even for Bach I found a place, and my audiences were on humming terms with Brahms, Haydn, Chopin, Cyril Scott, Debussy, Schumann, &c.—especially Beethoven among the greater composers. As Mr. Clarke says, 'There has to be a judicious admixture of music of the lighter kind.' But for the really good dramas, finely acted and beautifully staged, surely only good music must be used, and together the several arts, each ancillary to the other, are bound to raise the mind of the public and make it unconsciously desire the best. The cinema is an enormous power for the spreading of true musical education, and many a work must have suddenly meant something real to the masses through being used to translate into sound the very appealing, human emotions being shown on the screen. To the educated music-lover, moreover, the picture house can be a great help; it has so many opportunities for making little-known works familiar to its habitués, many of whom buy the works and learn them themselves. I too had no complaints at all from the management on the score of the music being 'too classical,' and since I left have heard many expressions of regret at the departure of the Beethoven Sonatas, &c.—Yours, &c.,

GRAMOPHONE RECORDS: ENGLISH AND FOREIGN CATALOGUES

Sir,—Apropos the 'Occasional Note' about 'Discus's' query, I have the catalogues of the French and Spanish gramophone companies and also the German Polydor catalogue, which is I believe practically the same as that of the German Gramophone Co. As regards standard of music recorded, this and the English catalogues are incomparably the best. The German catalogue is attractive for the great number of Lieder and Wagner records it contains. The French catalogue is the worst; the stuff in it is almost unbelievable. There is hardly a single decent orchestral record in it. The Pathé French catalogue I do not yet know. A letter in the February Gramophone about the American catalogue is also instructive.

How welcome to see such a distinguished authority as Mr. Klein telling the truth about Gerhardt! Hitherto mine has been a voice crying in the wilderness, and for years I have been saying publicly in letters and articles exactly what he (Mr. Klein) is saying now. Some fourteen or so years ago I remember hearing this singer attempt a Mozart Aria—which I cannot now recall. Although I was then only a boy, with an inexperienced ear, the memory of the devastating exposure the song made, as it would, of her very defective technique is still vivid.

The enchanting Julia Culp and your own superb Kirkby Lunn, besides being admirable singers, with whom as a singer Gerhardt does not bear comparison, are far more interesting even in Lieder, which are the latter's peculiar and especial province, and they are both far more versatile.

Mr. Newman, as we all know, regards Gerhardt as the ultimate of perfection in every respect; but as he has said that he could see nothing to admire in the voice, technique, or singing of Calvé, this need not surprise us.—Yours, &c.,

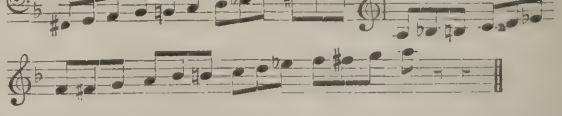
WAGNER AND THE BASS CLARINET: AND OTHER MATTERS

Sir,—May I draw attention to a point, which I have never seen noticed, relating to Wagner's writing for the bass clarinet? It is generally recognised as an unnecessary and futile proceeding to write for the extreme top register, where the notes are uncertain and poor in tone: yet this is what Wagner frequently does. Prout says:

> 'Instead of writing for it, as for the other clarinets, according to the fingering, he writes [in the bass clef] an octave lower. This possibly makes the score a little easier for the student, as the transposition is the same as for the other clarinets: but . . . it is certainly not to be recommended to the composer.'

Prout, however, fails to notice the fact that Wagner frequently changes from bass to treble clef: and then the trouble begins, for when he does this he still writes a tone (or a minor 3rd) only above the real sound. E.g.:

In B. 'Rheingold.'



It is perfectly obvious that this is meant to be a continuous scale-passage. In the ordinary treble notation, as used for the B♭ clarinet, it would be as follows:

This is an extreme instance, but several examples are to be found where the composer writes up to top E and F.

It appears as if, in changing the clef, Wagner had overlooked the fact that he was taking the instrument into these dangerous regions, thereby justifying Prout's warning against the method.

If I may be allowed to touch on two unrelated subjects in one letter, I should like to refer to a point in Sir Henry Hadow's book on 'Music' in the Home University Library. He says (p. 23):

> 'There is no conceivable reason why we should any longer write our speed-marks and expression-marks in Italian: it is easier to say "louder" than crescendo, &c.'

But surely there is a reason in the fact that Italian has become a universal language for this purpose, so that 'he who runs (or plays) may read,' whatever his nationality. We cannot all be linguists: most of us doubtless know the meaning of 'Langsam' and a few other words which have become familiar, but some of the weaker brethren would boggle at, for example, 'Allmählich etwas Beschleunigend': and one may imagine a studious German painfully searching in his un-grangerised dictionary for 'Louder Lots' and 'Don't drag.'—Yours, &c.,

THE ALTO VOICE

SIR,—Prompted by your reply to a correspondent in the January issue, may I, as an alto singer or counter-tenor, be allowed to express a view on the alto voice?

It is often stated that the alto voice is artificial and not a natural voice. The definition of 'Grove' is: 'The male voice of the lightest pitch.' If a man sings the contralto part in any of our choirs, he cannot always be said to be an alto. Many men can so fix the larynx that it will produce a falsetto quality, but they cannot be classed as altos because of this.

A voice that has never broken (referred to in your reply) is not an alto voice, but the boy's voice which has been retained by some freak of nature. This voice can always be recognised by the ordinary speaking voice of the man: he will always be found to speak, in daily conversation, in the same pitch as the average school-boy.

The real alto voice is possessed by the man whose voice as a boy broke or changed at the age of adolescence, and settled down again at a pitch higher than is usually the case. This man speaks in the ordinary way and sings with a range of about two octaves:  The break between upper and lower register is between C and F; in a well-trained voice no change is noticeable.

With regard to the present shortage of altos, I venture to say that it is simply because the modern composer does not write for altos. He writes for the contralto at a pitch which, if attempted by men, compels them to produce a tone of feminine type, naturally causing a feeling of discomfort and distaste in any man. When Byrd, Blow, Purcell, Croft, Green, Hatton, and their contemporaries wrote their wonderful works there could not have been a shortage of real male altos. To perform the works of any of the above masters in the style originally intended is impossible unless the natural alto is used.

Referring again to the reply given to your correspondent you say, 'There is an inevitable feeling of discomfort and distaste in hearing a man sing with a voice of feminine type,' and 'the air of unreality is too great for an audience's enjoyment.' Was the singing of Farinelli and Caffarelli (the two great pupils of Porpora), also of Bernacchi (pupil of Pestocchi), all three male sopranos, too great an unreality for an audience's enjoyment, when it was said, 'One God and one Farinelli'?

Even Mr. William Shakespeare in his excellent new book, 'Plain Words on Singing,' says, referring to the third section of the female voice:

> 'Male professors should remember that this is not that whoopy sound heard in the so-called male altos and also in yodling. It is as it were rudimentary in men, feeble and effeminate, and does not usually inspire respect. We do not associate it with men's characteristics.'

I do not think it is fair to receive such treatment. 'So-called' male altos were good enough for the old school—the great masters whose maxims and sayings are given as the guides of the earnest student of to-day, and whose works are still alive and will be when most of our modern trash is forgotten.—Yours, &c.,

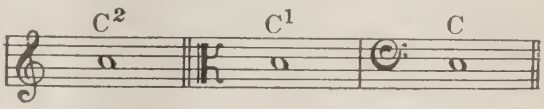
NEW SYSTEM OF MUSICAL NOTATION

SIR,—You recently published an account of a new system of musical notation. I devised a much simpler one when I was a lad, and it might be worth considering. If another line were added above the treble stave, and another below the bass stave, we should get six-line staves, in both of which lines and spaces would represent notes of the same name, but two octaves apart. A similar stave would be useful in the intermediate octave, having middle C^1 for its middle space. If six lines might confuse the eye, we could avoid this confusion by making the middle space slightly wider than the others. This middle space would always be C^1, the note which is really the starting-point of modern musical notation. The three staves would appear thus:



Anyone who could read from the present five-line stave would quickly learn to read from the six-line, which would come gradually into use, without any revolution.

The middle stave, with on a space, might puzzle string-players at first, but it would be a great boon to pianists by reducing the need for leger lines.

The use of the treble stave an octave higher, and of the bass an octave lower, indicated by dotted lines, would continue as at present.

Our present stave came into use before the general recognition of scales based on the octave; and reading from them is like reading from cryptograms.—Yours, &c.,

J. E. BARKWORTH.

'FESTE' AND A LECTURER

SIR,—In the name of common justice I beg space for a reply to a very damaging article from the pen of 'Feste,' which recently appeared in your March issue.

Your contributor bases scathing criticism upon a newspaper report of my lecture at Ashford, which is a most unfair and unwise thing to do, since such reports are notoriously inaccurate, and invariably incomplete.

I said in my lecture that 'Handel, Bach, and Mozart never fully realised the expressive possibilities of music'; and the report contained many other equally serious omissions and errors (inevitably, alas!).

Regarding the explanations asked for: my knowledge of musical literature in four languages, my possession of a very fine musical library, and my deep study and research in musical history generally, give me authority to satisfy your contributor; but I fear you would not allow me space for the long process of enlightenment. I can only refer him, therefore, to Thayer and Sangalli for information about Beethoven, and when he has read these works he will know the source of inspiration of the miscalled 'Moonlight' Sonata (which was fully explained to my audience, though not reported), and he may perhaps realise that he owes me an apology.

The reason why 'few people agree as to the meaning of any given piece of music' lies in the sad fact that few people (including even those who criticise others !) ever take the trouble to think clearly about music at all. Amongst those few who do study deeply, and do know, I always find complete unanimity as to meaning, though there are the same natural differences of opinion as to methods of actual presentation that are found in elocution.

Finally, in my lecture I myself made a point of stressing the futility of comparison in matters of art, but I still agree—despite my knowledge of da Vinci, Dante, Shakespeare, Goethe, Giatto, Wergeland, Buonarroti, Dürer, Rodin, Aristotle, Palestrina, Handel, Bach, Mozart, and others—I still agree with those who feel that Beethoven's is the greatest spirit that moves in any art, and 'Feste' may come to understand that feeling when he has studied as deeply and seriously as I have, but that will take him a very long time.—Yours, &c., Arthur Hirst.

104, Oxford Gardens, W.10.
March, 1924.

['Feste' writes: 'I need hardly say that I am sorry if I have done Mr. Hirst injustice. His letter, however, does not touch on the main point of my comment—viz., his statement that Beethoven showed us that "music could be a language just as clear as our language of written words." As I tried to demonstrate, no composer has ever shown us that, and no good is done to the cause of music by making absurd claims on its behalf. If music were as definite as ordinary speech it would lose most of its charm. Mr. Hirst's scornful dismissal of people who "do not agree as to the meaning of a given piece of music" is no answer to my questions: "If it has now been discovered that the first movement of the 'Moonlight Sonata' is a prayer, who made the discovery? And, if music is so clear a language, why had the meaning of the movement to wait a century before being discovered?" As to Mr. Hirst's closing sentence: if ever I do manage to study "as deeply and seriously" as Mr. Hirst, I hope I shall wear my learning more lightly. I shall certainly parade it less.']

'HISTORIAN OF OUR MAJOR OPERA HOUSE'

Sir,—I hate appearing to blow my own trumpet, but I am sure my friend Mr. Northcott, to whom your contributor 'F. B.' applies the title of 'historian of our major opera house,' would not cavil at my prior claim to be so-called, in virtue of my 'Annals of Covent Garden,' published by Chatto & Windus in, I think, 1909, in which I traced for the first time the continuous history of that theatre from 1732, the date of its foundation by John Rich, to the year in which the Syndicate became lessees under the Duke of Bedford. As most of the visitors who have written accounts of Mr. Northcott's collection seem to be unaware of the existence of my book, I hope I may be pardoned for mentioning it.—Yours, &c., H. Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of April, 1865:

The Leeds Express speaks highly of an invention, which has been recently patented, for the improvement of organs and harmoniums. The principle of the invention is this, that the highest note of any chord played on the keyboard is made to predominate with greater power than the harmony; and thus the melody always stands out prominently, as if produced by another instrument. Chevalier Lemmens and the professional gentlemen who have examined the patent have declared it to be an essential improvement; and as it can be applied at moderate cost to any instrument, it is likely to be most extensively used. The inventor is Mr. Dawes, engineer, of Leeds.

Clarinet player wishes to meet clarinet player for mutual practice at advertiser's home.—M. R., c/o Musical Times.

Bassoon, trombone, double-bass, and violas required for small orchestra for three performances of 'The Yeomen of the Guard,' to be given by members of the West Central Girls' Club, 31, Alfred Place, Tottenham Court Road, on May 4, 5, and 6, at 8. Particulars as to the orchestral practices to be had from Mrs. Herbert Lousada, 4, Clifton Place, Sussex Square, W.2.

Pianist (excellent accompanist) (lady) wishes to rehearse with students or others—singing, violin, or 'cello. Kensington district.—K., c/o Musical Times.

Vocalist (lady) wishes to instruct girls' singing class (evening)—Church institute or girls' club. S.W., or near S.E. district.—Raymonde, 23, Middleton Road, S.W.11.

Wanted, services of good amateur orchestra, to rehearse new work for pianoforte and orchestra. London or suburbs, April 22 to 30.—D. W., 6, Graham Road, W.4.

Violinist (medium ability) wanted for mutual practice on Mondays and Thursdays, 7.30 to 9.30. Good collection of varied music. 'Cellist, 20, Oseney Crescent, Camden Road, Camden Town, N.W.5.

Young lady pianist (A.R.C.M.) wishes to meet vocalist or instrumentalist for mutual practice. Streatham or Croydon districts.—Accompanist, c/o Musical Times.

Will vocalists, instrumentalists, and reciters willing to give services on Saturday and Monday afternoons to entertain members of clubs for the blind, please write to Paul Dalmas, hon. organizer, Social Clubs for the Blind, Braille and 'Servers of the Blind' League, 3, Upper Woburn Place, W.C.1.

Baritone wishes to meet accompanist for mutual practice (male preferred). Capable Bach, Strauss, Bridge, Delius, Rachmaninov, &c.—F. G. B., c/o Musical Times.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The students' concert in the Duke's Hall on February 16 was both successful and enjoyable. An admirable performance was given of the first movement from Franck's Quintet for pianoforte and strings, the executants being Messrs. Jean Pougnet, Hugo Rignold, Harry Berly, Douglas Cameron, and Miss Betty Humby. The ensemble of the players was especially notable. Some good pianoforte playing was given by Mr. Reginald King in 'Liebeslied,' Kreisler-Rachmaninov, and the Prelude in B flat, by Rachmaninov. Mr. Herbert Tree sang Handel's 'Where'er you walk,' from 'Semele,' with remarkable facility, and 'The Golden Journey to Samarkand,' from Elroy Flecker's 'Hassan,' was pleasingly recited by Miss Peggie Robb-Smith.

The concert on March 4 was perhaps even more noteworthy, from the fact that the programme contained two numbers for a combination of instruments not often heard in the concert-room. A Sextet for violoncellos, by Dunhill—of which the first and second movements were played—aroused unusual interest, and again the ensemble was most satisfactory. Moreover, the warmth of tone of the six 'cellos made a delightful and sympathetic effect. The composer, who was present, expressed himself delighted with the performance. The second novelty, so to speak, was the first movement of a Trio for oboe, horn, and pianoforte, by Carl Reinecke, and the performance of this uncommon piece of concerted music proved a great success. The three soloists, Miss Helen Gaskell (oboe), Mr. Alfred Cursue (horn), and Miss Guirne Creith (pianoforte), acquitted themselves admirably. Miss Gaskell is to be especially commended for her artistic playing. Two songs by Granville Bantock were well sung by Miss Grace Reynolds. In both—'Yung Yang' and 'A Feast of Lanterns'—the singer distinctly indicated the atmosphere of music and words. The late Principal, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, was an interested listener.

It is of very real interest to record the extended growth of orchestral practice and performances in the Academy, there being five separate and distinct orchestras in full work. The library of the Academy, already rich in countless works of great historic interest, has recently received a valuable addition in the score of Handel's oratorio, 'Samson,' composed in 1742, which has been presented by Mr. William Wallace. It originally belonged to William Crotch, the first Principal, and bears his name and address, and the date 1811 in his own handwriting on the fly-leaf. Dotted up and down the pages are several of his quaint annotations in faded ink, and that he was possessed of an acute critical faculty is proved by some of his remarks. Of one aria he says, 'Cut, surely this is the worst of all Handel's songs'; a phrase is curtly dismissed as 'Very bad, I never saw anything so bad.'

The following awards have been made: Goldberg Prize (contraltos) to Vera Kneebone (a native of Plymouth), Margaret Hale being very highly commended and Ethel Barker commended. The adjudicator was Miss Rosina Buckman. Sterndale Bennett Prize (female pianists) to Rene Cook (a native of London), Winifred Sanders and Dorothy Folkard being very highly commended, Muriel Warne highly commended, and the following were commended: Sybil Barlow, Jessie Furze, Vera Kneebone, Irene Hyman, Enid R. Wykes, Myra Ison, and Meta Davies. The adjudicator was Mr. Lloyd Powell. Philip L. Agnew Composition Prize to Ivor R. Foster (a native of Teignmouth), Reginald King being commended. The adjudicator was Mr. Arnold Bax. Edward W. Nicholls Prize (female pianists) to May Chipperfield (a native of Horley), Virginia McLean being highly commended. The adjudicator was Mr. Leonard Borwick. Emma Levy Scholarship (Jewish pianists) to Serach Mani (a native of Jerusalem), Yette Waxman being highly commended. The adjudicator was Mr. Rae Robertson.

MODERN HARMONY

With a view to breaking new ground, the Council of the Musical Association had proposed to have a discussion, at the meeting on February 10, on 'Modern Harmony from the Standpoint (a) of the Composer and (b) of the Teacher,' and had invited Mr. E. J. Moeran and Prof. C. H. Kitson to formulate their views on these respective points. Unfortunately, when the members assembled at the University of London, the secretary had to announce that at the last moment both these gentlemen were prevented from coming by illness. However, Prof. Kitson had sent a transcript of what he was going to say, and this was read to the meeting. He pointed out that this was a particularly difficult period for the teacher of harmony. Not only were problems made more complex and much wider in their sphere than ever before, but we were confronted with what was practically a new language. The composer of to-day used a new language, not because the old one was inherently bad, or had necessarily worn itself out, but because the new language was the vogue of the time and the reflex of the progress of thought in other spheres. Music was becoming more and more a concrete illustration of the spirit of the age in what might be termed 'applied music,' rather than an unconscious reflection of it as in the earlier periods. Nearly all the great composers had been misunderstood by their own generation. That was due partly to the fact that they were ahead of their time in outlook, and partly to the evolution of resource and the history of the infraction of rule. No sooner did a scheme of technique get settled, than there appeared a composer who apparently gave the lie to that scheme. When the change was so sweeping and radical as that we were now witnessing, there was a danger of all the experienced teachers of the earlier style being reduced to impotence.

But the teacher of harmony had not only to consider the potential composer, but also the large number of pupils who studied harmony in order to improve their general musicianship. The unrest which was prevalent among harmony students of the present day was due very largely to two causes: (1) The technique they were taught did not seem to have any connection with the music that was being composed; and (2) more than that, it often had little connection with any real composition. The younger generation was rightly rebelling against the dogmatic academicism which gave the student a large array of 'don'ts' culled from various text-books. The other extreme, as dangerous for the average student as the academic attitude, consisted of undue license at a wrong stage, leaving the student to work out his own salvation, which meant quickly working out his own ruin. Both attitudes were wrong because they ignored the historical side of the evolution of technique. The academic attitude was wrong because laws were given as being absolute. The other attitude was wrong because while giving freedom it did not explain the principles upon which freedom had been gained. The only way to teach harmony was from the historical point of view, both to the average student and the potential composer. The important thing was that a rule should be placed in its right setting.

Musical instinct without brains was as futile as brains without instinct: the result of the former was weak imitation, of the latter 'dry bones.' The average student at any rate must proceed from the known to the unknown. It was probable that the potential composer would work out his own salvation despite his teacher. A great deal of what he did was intuitive, and he would teach himself the rest. His intuition that survived would prove in the end to be a natural expansion of existing principles and resource.

For these reasons we may believe that what Mr. Newman called 'the harmony-teaching industry' was not about to die, but would be reborn with an ever-increasing sphere of usefulness. It may seem that there had ceased to be a theory of harmony, and it might be that we must rely more and more upon the æsthetic sense and less and less on intellectual cultivation. There must, however, be an understanding of previous science. One could not just sit down and write what he liked or disliked, and it was not helpful to the student if the only criticism the teacher could offer was that he liked or disliked this or that. There must be very good reasons for everything: without a firm basis for criticism one might mistake a fool for a genius. Because the new music was freed from the restrictions of the old, it was not easier to write. It demanded just as good brains, if not better, and just as much, if not more, instinct.

It would seem that text-books on harmony were useful only as records of an out-of-date technique, for when a technique had become sufficiently settled to be reduced to some sort of system by the theorist, practice had again moved on. But the ordinary beginner found it difficult to remember even a small part of what he was told, and he was hardly able to deduce his principles from actual music, any more than the school-boy could deduce Latin grammar from Cæsar. But text-books in general suffered from two serious defects: (1) Rules were not referred to their periods; (2) Rules were not stated in reference to differentiation of style. Current technique could only be studied from the actual music, and it must grow out of an earlier one that was known, for that of course was its natural evolution. It followed that we must always start with an earlier technique, and settle the further course of study in accordance with the student's aim, capacity, and predilections. The student with ultra-modern tendencies would not quarrel with his teacher if he felt he was being taught, not a set of rules, but the technique of some definite period.

At the conclusion of Prof. Kitson's paper there was a discussion, in which the principal speakers were Mr. James Swinburne, Dr. Yorke Trotter, and Dr. W. J. Phillips.

London Concerts

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The programme on February 26, conducted by M. Ansermet, ranged from Monteverdi to Prokofiev—a good thing to do so long as the journey is not in chronological order, as it was in this case. The first half, made up of Monteverdi's lengthy 'Sonata sopra Sancta Maria,' Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 1, and Haydn's 'Oxford' Symphony, tended to become monotonous, especially as the Symphony was given with a heaviness of gait that we expect neither from Haydn nor Ansermet. One of these items should have changed places with one in the second half—Debussy's 'Three Nocturnes' (brilliantly played), Prokofiev's Violin Concerto, and Ravel's 'Le Tombeau de Couperin.' The Monteverdi work had its interest, chiefly historical. It was for women's choir (used solely for the delivery from time to time of a simple ecclesiastical phrase), brass, strings, and organ, and showed the old composer with an adventurous eye on the ostinato, the continuous variation form, and the choral symphony. But it was too long for the actual musical value. The Prokofiev Concerto had its first English performance. It was, on the whole, free from the irritating school-boyish tricks that spoil its two predecessors for the pianoforte, and there were moments of real charm of a delicate kind in the first and last movements. The Scherzo roused laughter—not always suppressed—and was therefore held by some to be successful. But clearly the audience was tickled, not by any humour in the music, but by the frantic exertions of the fine and self-sacrificing soloist (Joseph Szigeti), whose ungrateful task was almost confined to prestissimo sawings in the upper reaches. He was seen rather than heard. More ungrateful and ineffective writing for the fiddle could hardly be imagined. But perhaps that was the joke! The female choir in the Monteverdi work and in Debussy's 'Sirènes' consisted of students from the Royal College of Music. They sang well, but there were too many of them for the Debussy, and as they looked and sounded like a remarkably healthy lot of typical young English women, they were a long way from suggesting sirens. The right effect can be got only by a few voices 'off,' or among the orchestra. Three rows of singers standing up at the back at once turn the effect into that of a choral society—the last thing Debussy wanted, surely. H. G.

SIR HENRY WOOD'S CONCERTS

Sir Henry Wood conducted Beethoven's fourth Symphony at Queen's Hall on March 7. Just about that time we had also the Septet, Op. 20, and the 'Pastoral' Symphony—a time of easy-going, smiling Beethoven. Perhaps we had been inclined to forget how much there is to be said for the even-numbered Symphonies. The gracious No. 4 came in victoriously that Saturday afternoon. Otherwise the concert was ordinary. Moiseiwitsch was the soloist.

Beethoven too was the centre of the previous concert of the series (February 21)—the C minor Pianoforte Concerto, played by M. José Iturbi, and very well played indeed, in a refreshingly straightforward, unaffected, musicianly way. The Symphony was Mozart in A, K. 201. In the smaller pieces we had English plain and French coloured—Butterworth's 'Shropshire Lad' and Ravel's 'Spanish Rhapsody.' C.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

M. Felix Weingartner conducted the London Symphony Orchestra's concert on March 9. After the 'Euryanthe' Overture there were two Symphonies—the 'Pastoral' of Beethoven and the 'Fantastic' of Berlioz.

This conductor is perhaps of rather too analytic a mind for the more luscious sorts of music, Wagner's, for instance. But in this programme his gifts of intelligence and taste shone like a good deed in a naughty world. After all, we are not at a concert necessarily to be browbeaten or overawed. Let a word be said for the charm of reasonableness, courtesy, and persuasion. The Beethoven was exquisitely tranquil, the Berlioz fierily animated. M. Weingartner remained perfectly self-possessed, and all the music was of an untroubled clarity. Germany has not sent us a peer of Weingartner for many a day. C.

MR. BESLY'S CONCERT

Owing to the defection of M. Furtwängler in February, Mr. Maurice Besly was first in the English field with Reger's 'Variations on a Theme of Mozart,' at Oxford, on March 5, then at Queen's Hall with the London Symphony Orchestra on March 12. While giving Mr. Besly full credit for his find, it cannot be said that the coming of the work merited longing anticipations. We expected to be amazed again by the composer's craggy technique, and we trembled a little before the orgy of aural analysis. In the event neither of these prodigies occurred. Reger had worked a mountainous pyramid on Mozart's mouse-like tune—the wee, sleekit Variation theme of the Sonata that every body plays because it is the easiest—but Reger's own Variations were so stony of musical ideas that he made less of the theme than Mozart did. Having little to say that mattered, he had less excuse than we usually grant him for saying it so portentously. There were un-Reger-like, Mascagni-sweet harmonizations that made the sensitive listener squirm. The whole worked up to a Fugue on a rather stiff subject that did not for the moment explain itself. At last the clue came when the two themes were played together, fortissimo, trumpets versus the rest (the quotation is unverified):

This first-year pupil's crudity was Reger's pinnacle—Reger, the master-builder! At the very outset the statement of the theme had been an ordeal in itself. Why was Mozart's Andante slowed into a halting Adagio, repetitions and all? Who did it—Reger, or Mr. Besly? It was a bad quarter-of-an-hour. The rest of the concert helped Mr. Besly to 'arrive' as a conductor. He handled two Symphonies—Haydn's No. 97, in C, and Franck's—intelligently, and showed a conductor's technique in getting his wishes. As a composer, his 'Mist in the Valley' was too tentative to establish him. His arrangement of a quiet Chorale Prelude of Bach's—muted strings and low-speaking wood-wind solos—left the impression that the Bach had been sweetly indicated but unsaid. M.

WOMEN'S ORCHESTRA

Is the cause of feminism languishing, that so few of its supporters cared to hear the British Women's Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall on March 11? When a concert is so scantily attended, the performers get at least the benefit of an extra dose of sympathy from every humane breast. To set against that is the fact that these ruthless women imposed on us yet another performance of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor. No sort of brilliance, or personal magnetism, or any art of the platform can at the present day make this music acceptable to some of us. And this time, for all Miss Katharine Goodson's manly blows at the solo, it was not of the first order. In fact the Orchestra's general achievement is still third-rate, though, as a Haydn Symphony and a rather pretty little Suite by Lalande showed, it is very much better than when it started. Miss Gwynne Kimpton conducted. C.

'GERONTIUS' AT THE ALBERT HALL

The Royal Choral Society sang 'The Dream of Gerontius' at the Albert Hall, under Mr. Hamilton Harty, with Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Charles Knowles as soloists. There must be a large number of exceptionally good, keen voices in this vast choir which, if its members were only mediocre, would be a hopelessly unwieldy body. It was remarkable how, everything considered, the singers responded to the effective, sharply pointed conducting of Mr. Harty.

The rich levels of Miss Balfour's singing and Mr. Knowles's virile style are well known. The Gerontius of Mr. Booth was a success so considerable that Londoners will have to hear more of him. Here is a singer of impeccable technique, and also of the intellectual refinement which we demand in this work. It is Elgar's fortune to have had a succession of singers able to do faithful justice to the hero of his wondrous masterpiece. C.

'THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS'

The American musical public has lately given a good welcome to several of our composers. The Wolverhampton Musical Society, the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, and the British Broadcasting Company handsomely paid back the compliment with a performance of 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' a cantata by Dr. Edgar Stillman Kelley, at Covent Garden, on March 12. The veteran composer was present, and being heartily called to the platform at the end, he made a speech of thanks with the neatness for which Americans are justly famous.

It is easier to talk of the performance than of the composition, so let us say first that if the Wolverhampton singers strayed from the pitch in an unaccompanied chorus of Celestials they gave themselves heart and soul to the many robust movements, and notably to the loud C major entry of Christian into Paradise. Mr. Joseph Lewis conducted, and the composer was well served by some distinguished soloists. Mr. John Coates gave to the tenor music all his admirable fervour and high art. Mr. Harold Williams sang the music of Christian, and seriously impressed us. This well-equipped baritone steadily advances. Perhaps the most grateful music—that of Apollyon and Mr. Worldly Wiseman—fell to Mr. Joseph Farrington, who in Vanity Fair had strains that took us back to Sullivan. Mr. Dennis Noble had the incidental part of the Narrator. All the soprano solos were sung by Miss Ursula Greville—they included a Shepherd, Madam Bubble in Vanity Fair, and an Archangel in the closing scene. She too exerted herself to the utmost, and if, like every one else, she was oppressed by the proximity and weight of the orchestra, she left no doubt that her singing has improved. Probably it was in sheer desperation that she permitted herself a number of piercing, 'uncovered,' high notes.

And the music? The intentions are too respectable to tempt us to be candid. If it were a young man's work, we should call for a sharpened tomahawk. Enough that the composer has not the gifts—has not the first of the gifts—demanded by his august theme. His music is not more than grammatical. One could believe that his mark would be a small secular cantata for a homely occasion. Musically this 'Pilgrim's Progress' is null and void. C.

LÉNER QUARTET

The series of historical recitals given by the Léner Quartet at Wigmore Hall concluded on February 28—much to the regret of the many admirers M. Léner and his colleagues have made in London. It was certainly a most successful experiment both on account of the excellence of the performances and of the interest they aroused. The Léner Quartet deserved no less, for it combines in a remarkable degree the best qualities of the old and the new string players. In deference to the composer's intentions, in absence of trickery and far-fetched effect, these exponents may be said to belong to the old school. In their command of tone effects they identify themselves with the moderns. That is really the basis of all string playing. In the old times violinists practised a big tone, and held that anyone could play softly without study—a big, clear outline was then the main thing. To-day, apparently, the reverse holds good, and we are so much concerned with fine detail that we are apt to forget the importance of clean, direct expression. These Hungarian players roar like lions and coo like doves—when they choose, and therein lies the secret of the extraordinary charm of their readings. Their control over the vibrato of the finger is as absolute as their control over the hand. Thus they get a great range impossible to those who, instead of mastering the vibrato, have been mastered by it. And the effect of vibrato on tone cannot be over-rated.

To praise a special performance above another is impossible. Their Mozart was flawless. Yet we all forgot it when they played Schubert. And surely there were moments when their treatment of Brahms was superb. On the final evening they gave us Franck, Goossens, and Debussy. The second movement of Franck's Quartet has certainly never been treated with such fine delicacy, and Goossens's music has just that touch of daring and roguery which, to our thinking, is most becoming in a young composer and the surest sign of good things to come. In conclusion, it is worth recording that Wigmore Hall has been full to overflowing on each occasion. There could be no better testimony to the flair of the Londoner for what is excellent in music. The Léner Quartet came to us unheralded. These players owe it to their own abilities and talent that they can already command full houses.

BIRMINGHAM STRING QUARTET

It never rains but it pours. Last year months passed without a single quartet recital. This year we have already had the Léner Quartet, the Copenhagen Quartet, the Budapest Quartet, the Rosé Quartet—to say nothing of local organizations. The Birmingham Quartet consists of four able and thoughtful musicians—both sexes are represented—led by Mr. Percival Hodgson. Their programme was on sound lines, and perhaps 'sound' is the adjective which best describes their most creditable qualities. Apart from a lamentable attempt to sentimentalise the Trio of Haydn's Quartet in C, Op. 54, their readings were unexceptionable. A certain lack of inspiration was felt in the interpretation of Vaughan Williams's Quartet in G; but there was otherwise no serious fault of either taste or technique. The most conspicuous weakness was not any individual shortcoming. The balance of tone, even in Haydn, tended to make the lower parts more important than the upper parts. The leader asserted himself in attack, but as the movements proceeded the initiative was often passing to the viola or to the 'cello without just cause. Possibly the Birmingham players have not worked together long enough for each member to be ready to fall into place naturally—or, may be, the acoustics of Wigmore Hall—new to them—intrigued them slightly. These are small drawbacks which will have disappeared probably when their next London venture takes place. B. V.

THE PHILHARMONIC TRIO

We were asked to consider Mr. G. O'Connor Morris's Trio for flute, oboe, and pianoforte (played by the New Philharmonic Trio at Wigmore Hall on March 2) as a modelling of style on Elgar's. It proved largely a modelling on the Violin Concerto, done openly and in good faith as a means of evolving good music. The method was to take the rhythmic frame and what might be called the sound-pattern of an Elgar theme and put different notes to it. Thus Mr. Morris's second movement, with Elgar's, opened:

Ex. 1.

The device was prevalent in the second movement, more so than in the first and third, although—had its half-brother. Just so an author might fill the blanks in: 'Of ——'s first —— and the —— of that —— tree' as poetically as he knew how and say he is modelling his style on Milton's, which would not be true. Mr. Morris's scheme did not work. Even without one's consciousness of Elgar's shadow the Trio was no more than scholarly, dignified, fluent, and so forth, and probably if the composer had started off on his own path he would have written music of more life.

This and a whole evening's repertory, much of it new, was played to admiration by the Trio, namely, Albert Fransella (flute), Leon Goossens (oboe), and G. O'Connor Morris (pianoforte). M.

SOME SINGERS OF THE MONTH

Mr. Plunket Greene, on February 28, gave a recital wholly of songs of Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, accompanied by Mr. Liddle. It was a touching occasion, and the audience appreciated this. So many of the songs had been written expressly for the distinguished artist: and as he sang it was evident that the past and its memories were working powerfully on his emotions. This is not the moment to give an estimate of Stanford's songs, but enough that such a recital must have been an eye-opener to anyone who had carelessly accepted the usual glib disparagement of Stanford. These songs had character and variety, and the wealth of them is still not enough known to British singers. The Irish dialect of so many of the words is of course a deterrent. It is easier to learn to sing in any of the Continental languages than in Irish-English. Here Mr. Plunket Greene is inimitable. But—singing under the stress of keen emotion—he did not otherwise offer himself as a model. He raced through many songs at so extravagant a speed that everything—rhythm and words alike—was lost. He thus spoilt that enchanting song 'Cuttin' Rushes.' Much of the singing was indeed hardly singing at all. There was no musical tone, and yet there was an attractive expression of a very personal wistfulness and fun, and now and then a phrase would be uttered with such perfection of verbal articulation as to be a thing of beauty.

Nineteen songs of Schubert, in the English versions of the new Oxford Schubert (by A. H. Fox-Strangways and Steuart Wilson), were sung by Mr. Steuart Wilson at his recital at Wigmore Hall.

What stood out first was the fact that only four or five songs were of the everyday Schubert. What admirable beauties there are in Schubert's less-known songs! Most singers stick to vol i. of the Peters edition. Some publisher should issue an album wholly of unfamiliar songs, with a good English text and in the mezzo-soprano range. This is a crying need. To hear some pieces of Mr. Wilson's selection was to realise that luck, not judgment, has ordained that some of Schubert is hackneyed and some ignored.

The new Oxford book of translations has been reviewed in these columns. Enough then to say that most of these versions are extraordinarily neat and apt. Singers who have learnt German may prefer in private and in small circles to cling to the original, but when facing a mixed audience they will be ill-advised indeed if they do not consider the advantages of conveying the sense as well as the sound of the songs to the public. It is certain that one of the reasons for the lifelessness of much English singing is the hoary tradition that words are not meant to be understood. How the atmosphere brightens when a singer makes it clear that he is bent on driving the verbal text as well as the melodic line into the comprehension of the listener!

Mr. Steuart Wilson has for long commanded the sympathetic interest of all who appreciate an unusually sincere and musicianly character in a singer, and it was a pleasure to note that he had made a considerable step forward in his art. Mr. Wilson's upper voice is gaining in solidity. This comes from better breath-control, and the resulting widening of the throat. One greatly admired his success with the difficult, high-lying melody of 'Idle Tears.' Here he justly maintained the right tension, and it was a comfort to hear the tone so firmly supported. But Mr. Wilson spoilt the 'Sun on his Setting' by his portamento singing. A fault frequently observed during the evening was the clipping of final consonants—'that' was, as often as not, 'tha'.' And then 'might' too often approached 'moight.'

Mr. Wilson, indeed, has still to work on his diction if he would make the telling verbal effect of Elwes in the past, and of our ever-admired John Coates. At present he scarcely does justice to his own translations, and the book of words was always necessary. A casual observer would perhaps have declared the singing to lack vitality. I would rather say that the singer has not yet the technique to give his vitality its chance. The ordinary animation of private intercourse needs a great heightening on the platform, and what may be a graceful attitude of modest deprecation in the one case will be dullness in the other.

Mr. Wilson has not realised the danger in singing a gloomy subject gloomily. He must smile more before he sings better. Save when he is actually cursing, the singer must always smile. The smile may not be joyful—it may be derisive or ironical—but it always serves the purpose of brightening the tone. No subject, however dismal, calls for a dull tone. We are afraid that a certain glumness was spread over parts of this concert—a glumness due to a miscalculation.

But a singer can never afford to be passive. He must ever be attacking. In lively songs Mr. Wilson was by a fraction not lively enough. Take the delightful 'Earthly Happiness.' There was a miscalculation. The singer was in effect less philosophic than the song. Given a reminiscent smile, the music would have quickened into its proper life. At the risk of seeming impertinent, one urges on Mr. Wilson the claims of the piccolo sorriso. Ah, if one could only by such simple advice instil some of Mr. Wilson's musicianly sensibility into some other singers, who will never give such pleasure as he, grin they ever so broadly!

The great 'Prometheus' and 'The Gods of Greece' were among Mr. Wilson's outright successes. His accompanist was Mr. Anthony Bernard.

Miss Marjorie Yrret sang on February 25, accompanied by Mr. Craxton. She has a pretty soprano voice of sensuous quality, unforced and agreeably free from throatiness. At present her singing lacks colour and light-and-shade. She seemed to be still too lately a student to have anything of musical interest to impart—she was still too intent on observing the rules she had learnt. Her Italian and French were just ordinarily acquired—we did not feel that they were yet the singer's second nature. She will be less nervous and will have more quality when she gets the habit of singing on a greater reserve of breath. To give one instance, the French song, 'L'Amour de Moi,' was sung for the most part on the very tail-end of her breath.

Miss Eleanor Marshall (Wigmore Hall, March 5) sang an artistically-chosen programme, which was further embellished by Mr. Leon Goossens's oboe playing. She gave us some English lute-songs, some arias from the Bach Cantatas, and examples of Schubert, Wolf, and Debussy. But for the most part it was hardly concert-singing. Miss Marshall used almost exclusively a head-tone of meagre character. It may have been applicable to the lute-songs and to Debussy (though, even so, it would have been better in a drawing-room), but the German music wanted a richer instrument.

Miss Joan Muirella sang, on March 11, Schumann's 'Woman's Love and Life' and Elgar's 'Sea Pictures.' She has a good voice—a warm mezzo-soprano—and might do really well if she were to develop her articulation. Words, she should observe, have ends as well as beginnings. This singer, one felt, was principally thinking of creating well-rounded sounds, but in the lack of any verbal shapes her smoothness soon became cloying.

Miss Phyllis Lett, who is going to Australia, sang at Queen's Hall on March 13, with orchestra, Sir Landon Ronald conducting. The programme was miscellaneous, but contained good things. One could but feel sorry at the maladroit use made of this fine voice. In the first part of the programme only one piece, Schubert's 'The Trout,' was well sung (and not the whole of that). Criticism here ventures to be severe in the hope of being salutary. The faults in Miss Lett's singing are popular—they are faults deliberately cultivated by many singers of 'O rest in the Lord,' a piece in which hooting and scooping are much enjoyed by inexperienced audiences in the country. These faults and this popularity between them breed a British style of contralto singing which is one of the most unpleasant national manifestations in executive music. Miss Lett sang well in 'The Trout,' and also in one or two of the songs towards the end of the evening, because the brisk tempo gave her no chance to lean on her tones. But in the serious tests of style, like 'Che faro' and Beethoven's 'Creation's Hymn,' the technical weakness was deplorable. Nearly all her upper notes were too closed. 'Land' became 'lond'; 'sky' was 'skoi.' And still a course of serious study would surely make a truly eminent singer of her.

Miss Cissie Marsh sang at Mortimer Hall. She proved to be a beginner, but there were signs indicating that she will be justified in working at her voice.

Mr. Angelo Desfi (tenor) (Æolian Hall, March 11) was also a singer who showed signs of incomplete training. His attempts at English were sportsmanlike. So was the French of his collaborator at this concert, a soprano, Miss Rosa Clare, who again was purely an aspirant.

Two agreeable baritone singers were heard on the same day (February 27)—Mr. Alfred Read and Mr. Percival Driver. Mr. Read chose a very varied programme, and proved to be an elert, equipped, competent singer. His voice is perhaps a useful rather than a conspicuously beautiful instrument, but such quick intelligence and skill as he showed are not common. Mr. Driver sang Somervell's 'Maud' songs. At times his intonation was faulty, and he probably had a cold. Nevertheless, there was much that interested one in this singer—he had studied, he knew how English words should sound, and he was not afraid of a degree or two of passionate expression.

Miss Dorothy Silk and the friends who have so often collaborated with her gave a concert of Bach, which included the 'Coffee Cantata,' on March 16. There is nothing to be added to former tributes to Miss Silk's art, except an expression of satisfaction that Londoners nowadays so keenly appreciate it. Here are a sensibility and a devotion to music which instrumentalists might well declare to be more usual among themselves than among vocalists. Miss Silk now has full recognition and fame. This should be an encouragement to artistic singers who dislike the path of those who make music serve them purely for self-display.

An American soprano, Miss Luella Melius, sang at Queen's Hall. After some rather acidulated high sopranos her mellifluousness was a pleasure. She reminded us that coloratura singing can sound beautiful and not merely difficult. This voice was not a mere squeak; it had solidity, sweetness. It was, so to speak, plump. In 'Una Voce' of Rossini she proved that one can be a soprano and still have a sense of humour. Occasionally in a quick-running, high scale Miss Melius allowed her breath to escape unduly, and so hardened her tone. But the one real fault in this singing was a narrowing of vowels on a descending scale. She sang the 'Bell Song' from 'Lakmé.' She ought to have given us some Mozart. H. J. K.

Competition Festival Record

FESTIVALS IN SCOTLAND

PERTHSHIRE, though one of the younger Scottish festivals, takes place as probably third in size and importance, being outstripped only by Glasgow and Edinburgh. The fifth annual Festival, just concluded at Perth, ran for seven complete days, and embraced twenty-two sessions. In the open choral classes a number of West of Scotland choirs travelled North to compete. In the male choir class, Glasgow Police had a narrow and doubtful victory over Clydebank; in the mixed and women's choir classes Perth Madrigal Society secured first place through its brilliant madrigal singing. Other interesting features were the exquisite singing of the infant choir from Perth Western District School, and the high level of the singing in the final stage of the Scots Folk-Song solo competition, the winner, Miss Cathie Campbell (Perth), being awarded the Federation of Music Industries cup for the best individual performance at the Festival.

The natural development of the RENFREWSHIRE Festival is being somewhat held in check by the depression in the shipbuilding and engineering industries. But the seventh annual Festival ran for seven days, and occupied twenty-three sessions. Principal winners: Mixed Choirs—Mr. Thorpe Davie's choir; Male Choirs—Glasgow Police; Women's Choirs—Linthouse Choral Society; School Choirs—Greenock High School.

The third annual Catholic Festival occupied three days at GLASGOW, and showed an advance on the previous year both in number of entries and in the standard attained, but the audiences were disappointing.

The third ARRAN Festival ran for two whole days at Lamlash. The choral work, both in the senior section and among the school choirs, showed a marked advance on the work of the previous year. Solo competitors were fewer, and not outstanding in quality.

THE ELIZABETHAN FESTIVAL, held at Kingsway Hall, London, on February 25-28, was for the third time a credit to its organizers, who appear to have an uphill task in winning for this event the recognition it deserves. The London public takes little notice of it. The support given to it by choirs is thin, but widespread. Five of the adult choral classes averaged under four entries. There were eight, however, in the female-voice class. Concerted solo singers—in twos, threes, fours, and fives—came in plentifully.

The following were the winning choirs:—Schools: St. Mark's, Bush Hill Park (Rev. E. S. Scroggs). Male-voice choirs: High Wycombe Orpheus (Mr. W. Bromage-Smith). Large choirs (sacred): Taunton Choral Society (Mr. Reginald Ward). Smaller choirs (sacred): Mansfield and Sutton Co-operative (Mr. F. Ward). Large choirs (secular): Taunton Choral Society. Smaller choirs (secular): Morley Madrigal Circle (Miss Jane Joseph). Female-voice choirs: Henry Nicholson Ladies' Choir, Oakham (no conductor).

At the end there was a most enjoyable concert given by the following artists: Mr. Harold Craxton (virginal music at the pianoforte), Miss Joan Elwes, Mr. Keith Falkner, the Kendall String Quartet, the London Male Voice Octet, and the L.C.C. (Staff) Philharmonic Choir.

Barnsley.—This Festival, held for the third time, extended to three days (February 26-28). More than a thousand children took part in it. A notable feature was the increased number of entries in the violin competitions. The winning male-voice choir was Cudworth Y.M.C.A. (Mr. H. Jolley). Royston Vocal Union (Mr. H. D. Thornton) was the only competitor in the chief mixed-voice class.

Bedford.—The 'Bedfordshire Eisteddfod Competitive Musical Festival' was started only four years ago, and already it ranks among the largest in the country. Not only is it elaborate and well supported, but it is everything that a Festival should be in its organization, its musical standard, and its 'atmosphere' generally. It is in the main a choral festival. Solo singing is represented, but it does not contribute to the fortnight's length (March 2-16) of the Festival as much as the choral singing of the county and the many types and sizes of choir that have to be allowed for in the competitions. This year two hundred and twenty choirs entered. The next thing to note is the popularity of folk-dancing. One class for dancers of ages up to eighteen brought in twenty-three teams. Another satisfactory feature is the public attendance, which is not only a sign of the healthy musical state of Bedford—to which one of the adjudicators referred—but helps to put the Festival on a good financial footing. At the time of going to press we have no report of the chief choral results, which were announced at the final concert, and are unable to give a representative list of results. The adjudicators report that they heard some choral singing of the highest quality.

Blackpool.—The following are the test-pieces in the open choral classes at Blackpool Festival in October: Ladies' Choirs, 'A': 'Love Song' ('Minnelied') (Brahms); 'Ode to Autumn' (Anderton). Male-Voice (tenor lead), 'A': 'Prospice' (Boughton); 'Zut! Zut! Zut!' (Elgar); 'Chanson à Boire' (special translation) (Poulenc). Male Voice (alto lead): 'Lady, those cherries plenty' (Morley); 'When winds that move not' (Wood). Mixed-Voices, 'A': 'O praise the Lord, ye saints above' (Byrd); 'My soul, there is a country' ('Songs of Farewell') (Parry); 'The Pampas Grass' (Op. 2, No. 1) (Sakhnovsky). Mixed-Voices, 'B': 'Lady, when I behold' (Wilbye); 'Music, when soft voices die' (Bantock); 'In Autumn,' Op. 104, No. 5 (Brahms).

Carlisle.—Ten new choirs entered in the twenty-fifth Carlisle Festival (March 10-14), which extended to five days for the first time. This is, and has always been, almost entirely a choral Festival, and as such it thrives wonderfully. A feature is the day set apart for business choirs—mixed, male, ladies', lads', and girls', with two quartet classes. These were at work (on March 10) till ten o'clock at night, and half an hour later a rehearsal started for next evening's concert, at which massed business choirs sang their test-pieces. The children's competitions similarly led up to a children's concert at which Nicholson's 'The Jackdaw of Rheims' was sung. In a new open class for choral societies the tests were 'Ring out, wild bells,' by Vaughan Williams, and Elgar's 'Go, song of mine.' The challenge shield went to Carlisle Madrigal Society (Mr. J. R. Cockbain) by a narrow margin. Goodwin Choir (Mr. W. H. Reid) was best in the open male-voice class. In other choral competitions, first prizes were gained by Haltwhistle Vocal Union (Mr. H. H. Bell), Fisher Street Presbyterian (Mr. J. A. Stewart), Stanwix Female-Voice Choir (Mrs. Easton), and Scotby Choral Society (Mr. H. T. Wardle).

Hazel Grove, Stockport.—There were eighteen choirs in four choral classes of this Festival, the winners being Aspinal Gorton Wesleyan (Mr. J. S. Andrews), Oldham Vocal Union Ladies' Choir (Mr. H. Hannam), St. Peters' Stalybridge Mixed-Voice Choir (Mr. P. Walsh), Crewe Apollo Co-operative Male-Voice Choir (Mr. J. Stubbs), and Altrincham P.M. Mixed Choir (Mr. J. A. Hill). Over a thousand competitors were said to have taken part on the two days—February 27 and 28.

Huddersfield. — The 'Mrs. Sunderland' Musical Competitions were held on February 11-15 with an increased total entry, but fewer choirs than last year. In the mixed-voice choir class only Gledholt Vocal Union entered. The male-voice class brought in five choirs, and some magnificent singing in Elgar's 'The Wanderer' and Vaughan Thomas's 'Here's to Admiral Death.' Todmorden (Mr. T. H. Lees) was awarded first prize. Of six school choirs who competed, Marshfield Central, Little Horton (Mr. R. Thornton) was the winner of the Firth Shield. Solo work bulks largely in this Festival. In one junior pianoforte class a hundred and thirteen youngsters played Julius Harrison's 'The Pixie Man.' On the Saturday evening a presentation was made to Mr. Thomas Thorp, who has been secretary of the Festival for thirty-one years.

Skipton.—The third annual Festival held by the Skipton Co-operative Society took place on two Saturdays—February 28 and March 7. In the open male-voice choral class there was keen competition between Skipton Male-Voice Choir and Steeton Male Glee Union, both conducted by Mr. H. Wrathall. Skipton won by half a mark.

Wimbledon.—The first Wimbledon Festival, held on February 18-21, was founded by Mr. Willoughby Walmisley, who is to be congratulated on his public-spirited enterprise. The organization, at the hands of Mr. T. Lidstone Found, the hon. secretary, was thorough, and the success of the Festival was what one would describe as normal for a populous suburban district. Soloists, especially juvenile pianists, there were many, and choirs there were few. Five choral classes drew one choir each. The names of these pioneers deserve to be recorded: Central School (mixed choir), Wimbledon Common; St. Catherine's Ladies' Choir, Guildford; Clapham Parish Church Choir; St. Cuthbert's Girls' Club, Wimbledon; Wimbledon Church Choral Society. There were five elementary school girls' choirs, however, and these did well in Dunhill's 'The Owl' and Rutland Boughton's 'The Piper's Song.' Pelham Elementary School, Wimbledon, were the winners. The disparity between the forwardness of soloists (thirty-one mezzo-sopranos, for instance) and the backwardness of choirs is not a sign for discouragement, for soloists abound everywhere, and it is the function of festivals to bring choirs to birth. In time, no doubt, Wimbledon will have its faithful progeny.

BACH WORKS STAGED AT GLASGOW

One of the most attractive events in an overcrowded musical season at Glasgow has been the production by the Glasgow Bach Society last month of Bach's humorous 'Peasant' and 'Coffee' Cantatas in operatic form, probably for the first time since their birth nearly three hundred years ago.

A good deal of re-arrangement of these bright little works was required to make them suitable for stage (or choral concert) presentation. This has been done with quiet, good taste and unfailing judgment by Mr. J. Michael Diack (who founded and conducted the Glasgow Bach Society eighteen years ago, and is one of its present conductors) and Mr. H. E. Baker. In expanding certain duets and trios into choral form, and in the interpolation of choral matter in some of the vocal solos and orchestral interludes, care has very properly been taken to adhere scrupulously to Bach's own material. Both Cantatas deal with episodes of peasant life, folk melodies abound, and many of the numbers are based on merry dance tunes.

The 'Peasant' Cantata was written by Bach in 1742, and performed as an act of homage to Carl Heinrich von Dieskau on his becoming 'Lord of the Manor.' The libretto, written by Picander, deals with the rejoicings of the villagers and their congratulations and good wishes to the new lord and lady. In the original version, owing possibly to the limitations or exigencies of the occasion, only two solo voices are employed, the opening and closing numbers being duets. The stage version used is a re-arrangement for solo voices and chorus.

The 'Coffee' Cantata, for which also Picander supplied the libretto, was written by Bach in 1732. The Cantata deals with the efforts of a father to compel his daughter to give up the habit of coffee drinking, a habit which had become a passion with German ladies in the early 18th century. In the original version, three solo voices are used — the father, the daughter, and a narrator, the work closing with a trio. The stage version has been planned to make the work available to choral and operatic societies by the addition of an opening chorus and recitative from the Cantata 'Auf schmetternde Töne' and a chorus from the Cantata 'Der zufriedengestellte Æolus.' The work, thus arranged, presents therefore a play within a play. The villagers are gathered to welcome the return of the lord and lady of the manor from their honeymoon, and the seneschal or factor has prepared for their entertainment a little play, the 'Coffee' Cantata.

For the production at Glasgow special dances were arranged, the ballet music being selected from Bach's own Dance Suites, and re-scored (like the Cantatas themselves) for a chamber orchestra of strings and wood-wind.

The Cantatas were produced at the Lyric Theatre, Glasgow, principals, chorus, and orchestra all being drawn from the Glasgow Bach Society. Mr. J. Michael Diack and Mr. F. H. Bisset shared the conducting, and four performances were given to crowded houses. To most of those who attended, Bach in an 'unbuttoned' mood obviously came as a complete and delightful surprise, the gaiety, tunefulness, and unaffected charm of the lovely diatonic melodies, and the clean, musical, self-enjoying effectiveness of the whole production making an immediate capture of the several audiences, many of whom returned a second—some even a third—evening to renew and deepen acquaintance with the jovial old master. One can foresee a production of this kind in the hands of a Barry Jackson or an Arthur Playfair having an extended run as a popular attraction.

Music in the Provinces

AXMINSTER.—The Choral Society of fifty voices, with increased male membership and improved standard, sang 'The Revenge,' Alec Rowley's 'The Doughty Knight,' and Eaton Faning's 'Moonlight,' on February 18, under Mr. G. L. Adams.

AYLESBURY.—Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was played by the Aylesbury Comrades' Orchestra, under Mr. W. Newton, at the Town Hall, on Sunday evening, March 1.

BATH.—The Choral and Orchestral Society's second concert was held on February 17. The choir sang madrigals of Benet, Gibbons, Festa, and Edwards, and modern part-songs; the orchestra played a Byrd Fantasia and five movements from Parry's 'English' Suite.

BEDFORD.—A recent programme of the Musical Society, conducted by Mr. H. J. Colson, included Beethoven's fifth Symphony and Dr. Harding's two Egyptian Dances, under the composer's direction.——Other music gave way to the fortnight's Festival that began on March 2.

BEXHILL.—At the Colonnade Tchaikovsky's A minor Trio, Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' and two movements of the 'Eroica' were heard towards the end of February.

BRISTOL.—At the eighty-first ladies' night of the Royal Orpheus Glee Society, Mr. George Riseley conducted the choir in twenty-two pieces, of which three—arrangements by Mr. C. Lee Williams—were new.——Bristol Ladies' Choir, under Miss Florence Bradfield, sang Colin Taylor's 'Three Slumber Songs of the Madonna' and a group of songs from 'The Princess,' by Holst, as part of an excellent programme, on February 25.——The Harmonic Male Choir, under Mr. Joseph Jenkins, followed a week later with S. E. Lovat's 'Hereward the Wake,' and a number of familiar pieces, including the 'Mulligan Musketeers.'——Orchestral concerts have included a popular selection by the Colston Hall Orchestra, and a concert by the Symphony Orchestra on March 4, at which Mr. Goossens conducted Debussy's 'L'Après-Midi d'un Faune,' Rachmaninov's second Symphony, and some Wagner. The concert was broadcast viâ Cardiff.——The English Singers, on tour with Miss Isolde Menges, paid a call in February.——Paderewski gave a recital on March 12.

BIRMINGHAM AND DISTRICT.—The Brahms 'St. Anthony' Variations, so rarely heard here nowadays, were the outstanding feature of the Sunday concert on January 15. They were followed by the same composer's D major Symphony. The tempi in both were rather slow, but they were thoughtfully conducted by Mr. Adrian C. Boult. Mr. Karl Melene sang the 'Credo' from Verdi's 'Othello' with admirable feeling for the dramatic grandeur of the aria. Clear diction was a notable feature of his singing. At a subsequent concert Mr. Boult revived Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Symphony in D and the 'In der Natur' Overture of Dvorák. Mr. Joseph Lewis, the deputy-conductor of the Orchestra, conducted the 'New World' Symphony.——The open rehearsal for the Royal College of Music Patrons' Fund was held at Birmingham Midland Institute on March 3. Students from both institutions contributed to the programme, and Mr. Boult conducted most of the items. Two conducting students, Mr. Michael Wilson and Mr. Guy Warrack, each however took charge of a work. A favourable impression was made by Miss Marie Wilson, a young violinist from the Royal College, who played Wieniawsky's D minor Concerto.——At a Birmingham Symphony concert, on February 17, Miss Harriet Cohen was the soloist in Arnold Bax's Symphony Variations for pianoforte and orchestra. A recognised interpreter of this composer's music, she played with much skill. In Schumann's Symphony in D minor, No. 4, Op. 120, Mr. Boult secured a very satisfactory performance. Mozart's 'Il Seraglio' Overture and three Nocturnes by Debussy completed the programme.——Mr. Eugène Goossens took charge of a symphony concert on March 10, when Bliss's 'Colour' Symphony was the principal item. Heard for the first time at Birmingham, it held the audience somewhat at a distance. The orchestra rose to the occasion remarkably well, and the work was heard to great advantage. Liszt's symphonic poem 'Orpheus,' was also given.——At a Max Mossel concert, on February 18, the English Singers charmed the audience with madrigals by Weelkes, Wilbye, and others. Some folk-songs set by Vaughan Williams were beautifully sung.——A huge audience assembled to hear Paderewski at his recital on March 20. His programme included Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, arranged by Liszt, Mozart's A minor Rondo, the D minor Sonata of Beethoven, Op. 31, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Paganini, and many pieces by Chopin. Liszt's 'Don Giovanni' Fantasia was most beautifully played.——On February 16, Paderewski's Sonata for violin and pianoforte was an outstanding feature of a concert given by Miss Winifred Browne and Mr. William Primrose. Mozart's Sonata in F and Brahms's A major Sonata were also included in the programme.——Arensky's D minor Trio was played by Miss Beatrice Hewitt, Miss Katie Goldsmith, and Mr. J. Hock, on February 19. Schubert's beautiful B flat Trio was also given, and Mr. Robert Parker sang songs by Strauss and Schubert.——A quartet of 'cellists played an unaccompanied Suite by Bach and an arrangement of Beethoven's Three Equali for trombones, at a subsequent concert.——The lunch-hour concerts given by the City Orchestra have been a success. Though it has been impossible to arrange more than four this season, a longer series has been promised for next year.

BLACKBURN.—The Glee and Madrigal Society's programme for February 24, under Mr. Thomas L. Duerden, included Stanford's 'Merlin and the Gleam,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' the 'Oberon' and 'Tannhäuser' Overtures, and Nicholson's 'The Jackdaw of Rheims,' to be sung by St. John's Church Boys' Choir. It was preceded in a local paper by an excellent article on the music, written by the conductor.

BLACKPOOL.—The season of chamber concerts at the Hotel Metropole came to an end on March 3, with a visit of the English Singers.

BOGNOR.—'The Creation' and 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' with the five-four movement from the 'Pathetic' Symphony in between, were the programme of Bognor Philharmonic Society at its fifth annual concert, under Mr. Whitehead.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Recent programmes at the Winter Gardens have included Bantock's 'Hebridean' Symphony, Franck's Symphony, the 'Eroica,' Haydn's 'London,' and a Suite for violin and orchestra by Tanéïèv, played for the first time in England.——On February 27, Sir Dan Godfrey reached the ninth of his lectures on musical appreciation. On the following evening both he and the orchestra turned comedians, and the audience enjoyed a new form of popular concert.

BRADFORD.—Mr. Julius Harrison conducted a miscellaneous concert by the Permanent Orchestra on February 21—Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto, by Mr. William Primrose, Listz's 'Les Préludes,' Chabrier's 'España.'——Numerous vocal and instrumental recitals have been given by local players, by Madame Gerhardt, and by Paderewski.——The McCullagh Quartet played Herbert Howells's 'Lady Audrey's' Suite on March 5.

BRIGHTON.—The Musical Club has played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, the Royal Marines Band has given 'La Boutique Fantasque,' Dvorák's E flat Quartet has been played at one of M. Belifante's chamber concerts, and Madame Adila Fachira has given a recital, but Paderewski's recital at the Dome on February 28 has been the affair of the moment—unless it was the Brighton Council's rejection of the £14,000 scheme for a municipal orchestra.

CAMBORNE.—Mr. James Martin conducted the Vocal Society in an excellent programme of part-songs on Sunday evening, February 15.——A small audience patronized the concert of the Cornwall Symphony Orchestra at St. George's Hall on February 22. The programme, given under the direction of Dr. Charles Rivers, included Beethoven's second Symphony, the 'Danse Macabre' of Saint-Saëns, and the 'Freischütz' Overture.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Cambridge branch of the L.N.E.R. Musical Society gave a concert at the Guildhall on February 28, the male-voice choir being conducted by Mr. Joseph Reed.——The 'Popular' concerts at the Guildhall on Saturday evenings have continued to justify their name. Miller's Symphony Orchestra played on February 21.

CHELTENHAM.—Three series of concerts at the Town Hall have run their course—the Max Mossel, the Classical, and the Appleby Matthews orchestral concerts. The last-named closed on February 26, when the feature of the programme was the 'Pathetic' Symphony, and Dr. A. H. Brewer conducted his Suite, 'The Miller's Green.'

CHESTER.—The Chester Welsh Choral Union recently gave Elgar's 'The Light of Life' at the Town Hall, Mr. J. Matthews Williams conducting. The orchestra also played the 'Figaro' Overture, and a movement from a Bach Suite in D.——The Sidebottom Trio gets very little encouragement to continue fostering chamber music at Chester. Only a small audience heard these players give the Brahms Trio, Op. 101, on March 3.

COVENTRY.—In less than eighteen months Coventry has seen the end of three orchestras: first, the Armstrong-Siddely Orchestra, then the City of Coventry Orchestra, and now the Rover Orchestra, which used to give concerts under Mr. W. R. Clarke at the Rover Sports Club. In each case lack of public support has been the cause.

DARLINGTON.—At its February concert the Bach Choir had a fine selection of music to sing under Dr. Kitson's direction—Byrd's 'Bow Thine ear,' two part-songs of Elgar, the Brahms 'Alto Rhapsody,' with Miss Ada Gent as soloist, two Stanford part-songs, and Holst's eight-part 'Ave Maria' for ladies' voices. The Bach music was provided by Mr. Harold Samuel, who played the fifth Partita, the 'English' Suite, the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, and three Preludes and Fugues from the 'Forty-eight.'

DERBY.—The thirty-first annual concert of the Orpheus Society was held on March 10, Dr. A. G. Claypole conducting. Among the part-songs in the programme were Carse's 'The tide rises, the tide falls' and Elgar's 'Zut, zut.' Songs were given by Miss Esther Coleman.

DONCASTER.—The choir of the Musical Society, a well-trained body directed by Mr. H. A. Bennett, gave Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' on March 12, before a small audience.

EASTBOURNE.—Programmes of the Municipal Orchestra at Devonshire Park have included Mozart's Symphony No. 40, a Violoncello Concerto in G, by Porpora, played by Miss Marjorie Edes (the Concerto was recently discovered in the British Museum), Franck's Symphony and 'Le Chasseur Maudit,' and Brahms's Violin Concerto, played by Miss Jelly d'Aranyi.

GATESHEAD.—Mr. Norman Allin sang at the first annual concert of the Gateshead Male-Voice Choir, given under the direction of Mr. G. W. Danskin. The choral pieces included Dunhill's 'Full fathom five' and two three-part airs by Weelkes.

GLOUCESTER.—A new part-song by Lee Williams was produced by the Orpheus Society as part of an excellent programme that included a group of Elizabethan pieces, Fletcher's 'A Lullaby of Love,' and Graham Godfrey's six-part 'Come away, Death.' Mr. S. W. Underwood conducted.——Brahms's third Symphony was played by Gloucestershire Orchestral Society on March 5, under Dr. Brewer. The Society has already given Brahms's first and second Symphonies in recent years.

GRANTHAM.—Great success attended the concert of the Grantham Philharmonic Society on March 12, when Mr. Edward Brown conducted Volbach's 'The Page and the King's Daughter' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.'

GUERNSEY.—The Guille-Allès Choral and Orchestral Association celebrated its twenty-fourth season with a Festival on February 19 and 20. Under Mr. John David the choir sang 'The Creation' on the first evening, and Bath's 'Wake of O'Connor' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' on the second, the orchestra also giving Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. The soloists were Miss Mair Jones, Miss Florence Fielden, Mr. Sam Hempsall, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

HALIFAX.—Elgar's 'The Music-Makers,' Dame Ethel Smyth's 'Hey, nonny no,' and Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' were sung by the Halifax Choral Society on March 5, under Dr. Tysoe's direction. Mr. Herbert Johnson played Beethoven's G major Pianoforte Concerto, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra opened the concert with the Handel-Elgar Overture.

HEREFORD.—The annual concerts of the Herefordshire Orchestral Society were given at the Shire Hall on February 23 and 24, Dr. Percy Hull conducting. The programme—the same on both occasions—included Brahms's second Symphony, the third 'Brandenburg' Concerto, Stanford's 'Shamus O'Brien' Overture, and six numbers from Elgar's second 'Wand of Youth' Suite.

HUDDERSFIELD.—On February 17, Dr. T. E. Pearson conducted the Glee and Madrigal Society in a programme of madrigals and part-songs, including Wibye's 'Ye that do live in pleasures plenty' and Cornelius's 'To the Storm Wind.'——The Arthur W. Kaye Orchestra played Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, and other popular works on February 21. This orchestral venture, which does everything it attempts well and completely (there are always a number of Hallé players in the ranks), is faced with the usual problem of money shortage, and there is a danger that it may come to an end.——The Philharmonic Society concluded its winter season on March 3 with a programme that included a Haydn Symphony, Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, and a selection from 'Iolanthe.'——Sir Walford Davies gave a lecture on choral singing at the Town Hall on March 9.

Hull.—The Ladies' Musical Union, conducted by Miss Eleanor Coward, sang the 'Rhine-maidens' Trio and part of Pergolesi's 'Stabat Mater' on March 5.——'Elijah,' with some of the best soloists in England, closed the Harmonic Society's season on March 6. Mr. Walter Porter conducted.——A performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' by the Vocal Society, on March 11, seemed to have surpassed all previous efforts of Dr. Coward and his singers. The principals were Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

Hunstanton.—A large audience came on March 4 to hear the Choral Society sing under Mr. B. Roden Hilder. The programme consisted of Bach's 'O Light Everlasting,' Elgar's 'For the Fallen,' Arensky's D minor Pianoforte Trio, played by three ladies, Armstrong Gibbs's 'Song of Shadows,' for female voices, Geoffrey Shaw's 'Worship,' and songs sung by Mr. Roy Henderson.

Ipswich.—Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, minus the third movement, was played by the Orchestral Society on February 24, Mr. Edgar R. Wilby conducting. Glazounov's 'Solenelle' Overture and Debussy's 'Petite Suite' were in the programme. Miss Florence Austral gave 'Elizabeth's Greeting,' with orchestral accompaniment.

Leeds.—The University Choral Society gave 'The Revenge' and Parry's 'Scenes from Prometheus Unbound' on February 27, under Mr. Wilfred Dunwell.——The only other important choral concert to record is that of the Leeds New Choral Society on March 4. Though handicapped by an unusual disproportion between the sexes, the choir, under Mr. C. H. Moody, came creditably through a difficult programme that consisted of Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region,' two of Holst's 'Rig Veda' Hymns, and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' sung twice. The orchestra played Mozart's G minor Symphony.——Mr. Eugène Goossens conducted the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, on February 28, in the 'New World' Symphony, Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' Debussy's 'L'Après-Midi d'un Faune,' and Stanford's first Irish Rhapsody.——The Leeds Symphony Society, an orchestra of amateurs, has given three concerts, for each of which the Yorkshire Evening News bought a thousand tickets for the use of school-children.——A String Quartet by Edric Cundell was played at the Bohemian concert on February 25.——The principal visitors have been the English Singers and Paderewski.

Manchester.—At the time of writing (mid-March) the Hallé and Brand Lane orchestral series are completing their course, the commencement of the B.N.O.C. season coinciding with the Hallé Pension Fund concert. The events of the last month which abide in memory almost to the exclusion of other notable happenings have been the two visits of Paderewski to the Brand Lane concerts and the unusually well-prepared Hallé production of Bach's B minor Mass. These were great concerts in the real sense of the word. Paderewski gave some of the judges of modern pianistic 'form' a good deal to think about, and some of our contemporary and greatly over-rated oktaven-bändiger gentlemen were very quietly, but very authoritatively, put in their rightful places—amongst the 'also rans.' Periodically we get these chances for a readjustment of our artistic values. The coming after a long interval of a Kreisler or a Paderewski enables us, so to speak, to have our critical compasses tested and reset, and musical criticism sets forth on new voyages with much truer confidence.——For the fourth year in succession the B minor Mass has provided the last choral concert of the Hallé series, and Harty's handling of this mighty theme has to-day much more authority. This recent performance was greatest on its orchestral side, and the Hallé organization may well be proud of its obbligato players. The choir had been prepared for this work by Mr. Harold Dawber (on Mr. R. H. Wilson's recent retirement after thirty-six years' service), and sang very indifferently until the Gloria. Thereafter the mighty choruses were done with conviction. The number of competent Bach solo singers is gradually extending, and Miss Suddaby and Mr. Horace Stevens must certainly be ranked in that small but select company.——The greatest personal triumph of the entire Hallé season was occasioned by Miss Jelly d'Aranyi's playing of Mozart and Ravel on February 26. An almost infallible guide to a player's quality may be found in the attitude of the orchestra either in rehearsal or performance, and the players' bearing towards the interpreter, as distinct from the mere virtuoso, may be accounted the finest compliment that is in their power to confer.——Of the many 'revivals' for which Hamilton Harty has been responsible, none is more to his credit than the fourth Symphony of Dvorák, which was last played at Manchester in Hallé's time, over thirty years ago. The sparkling spontaneity of it all, and its abounding vivacity and high spirits, gripped players and public alike. It won't lie on the library shelves for another thirty-three years.——Murdoch on this evening gave us a contemplative reading of the Beethoven C minor Pianoforte Concerto—very interesting and stimulating to thought, if not convincing. Other aspects of his chamber music playing may be discussed later.——Inghelbrecht's orchestral poem, based on the old Japanese Snow Festival theme, is one of those works—in Berlioz's phrase—of the à peu près order. The scene and theme may have made him feel, but he has not got it in him to make us, in turn, share the ecstasy. Time and patience were devoted to its preparation, but it quite failed to make any vivid impression. One of the disappointments of the season has been the non-appearance of Benjamin Dale's new work specially written for the Hallé concerts.——In chamber music, the greatest distinction has lain with the Bowdon Chamber Society for bringing the Rosé players to Manchester, if only to its most renowned suburb. The Catterall Quartet has developed the awkward habit of playing its programme in an order varied from that advertised. This has led on two occasions to missing the works one most wished to hear—e.g., the great César Franck Quartet and the Elgar Quintet. Well as this quartet plays in other things, that affords only poor consolation for what one failed to hear, especially when next day glorious accounts of it are given.——The Capelle Quartet of ladies is, one imagines, the first of its kind from abroad to visit Manchester. May we say that hitherto the Ravel Quartet has been presented; now it was played in the gloriously easeful fashion bred of long intimacy. Not many quartets excel this combination in beauty of balance and poise of style; lacking some other essentials they yet take high rank as true ensemble players. Dr. McNaught would have said that they are a quartet and not four soloists!——At the Noon-tide concerts Mr. Hamilton Harris took us into the little-known territory of Bach arias, with trumpet obbligato—played by his brother Alec. Manchester in the past has enjoyed, at the hands of men like Harris, Charles Neville, and others, the fruits of such pioneer investigation work, and there are no surer ways to full eventual recognition than along those lines.——Dr. Brodsky and Miss Dora Labbette brought up the tale of the Tuesday mid-days to Nos. 449 and 450. The Elgar Violin Concerto, with Mr. R. J. Forbes at the pianoforte in his most masterful mood, sent a large audience back to business again feeling very much exalted.

The 'St. John' Passion will be sung at St. Stephen's, Bow, on Palm Sunday (April 5), and on Good Friday, at 7. Tickets (on which are directions as to the locality of the church) may be had from the Rev. G. H. Lancaster, St. Stephen's Vicarage, Bow, E.3.

A concert in aid of Westminster Hospital will be given at the Royal Albert Hall on April 22, at 7.30, by Barclay's Bank Male-Voice Choir. A strong force of soloists will also appear—among them Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Edith Furmedge, Mr. Peter Dawson, Mr. W. H. Squire, and Lamond. Mr. Herbert Pierce will conduct.

Music in Scotland

Edinburgh.—Notices of concerts by Paderewski, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mrs. Kennedy Fraser, and Mr. Max Mossel will be found under Glasgow.——We are happy to record the re-appearance of Prof. Tovey after a prolonged period of illness. Five of his Sunday evening concerts fall to be noticed—a pianoforte recital by Mr. Petrie Dunn of works by Beethoven, Chopin, and Schumann; a recital by Miss Marie Thomson (soprano), Miss Mary Grierson (pianoforte), and Mr. Watt Jupp (violin); a recital at which Miss Grierson and Mrs. Maitland played the Bach C major Concerto for two pianofortes and strings and Schumann's Variations, Op. 46, for two pianofortes, and the Edinburgh String Quartet played works by Beethoven and Schubert; a Beethoven recital by Prof. Tovey himself; and a trio recital at which Trios by Bach and Mozart, and a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and cor anglais, by Prof. Tovey, were played by him in conjunction with members of the Reid Orchestra. —— At the fourth of the University Historical Concerts, the Edinburgh String Quartet played Quartets by Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Haydn. At the fifth concert, Prof. Tovey joined the quartet in the Brahms Quintet for pianoforte and strings, and unveiled a bronze Memorial Portrait Plaque of Prof. Frederick Niecks, his predecessor in the Reid Chair of Music at Edinburgh University, who occupied the chair for a period of twenty-three years.——Mr. Adrian Boult conducted the seventh of the Reid Orchestra Concerts, and the Misses May and Beatrice Harrison played the Brahms and Delius double Concertos for violin, 'cello, and orchestra. At the eighth concert, Prof. Tovey resumed duty, sharing the conducting with Mr. Boult, and playing the solo part in Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte Concerto and the 'Prometheus' Variations. The programme included also the 'Eroica' Symphony.—— At the concert given by the Edinburgh University Musical Society, Prof. Tovey's place as conductor was taken by Mr. Greenhouse Allt, and the programme included Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' a Haydn Symphony, a Mozart Concerto for flute and harp, and some students' songs.——The activities of the Edinburgh Bach Society embraced an historico-chronological organ recital by Mr. Greenhouse Allt, in St. Giles's Cathedral, and a charmingly old-world programme by the Dolmetschs.—— Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. Paul Della Torre) played Beethoven's eighth Symphony, and was associated with Miss Nannie Hamilton Jamieson, a talented young Edinburgh violinist, in Max Bruch's Concerto. Miss Jamieson was associated also with Mr. G. Forrest Neillands earlier in the month in a violin and pianoforte recital.——Mr. Moonie's Choir sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon Suite' and Hubert Bath's 'The Wake of O'Connor,' the programme including also Mr. W. B. Moonie's own 'Perthshire Echoes,' for string orchestra. —— The Edinburgh Catholic Choral Society (conductor, Mr. W. B. Moonie) sang Beethoven's seldom-heard Mass in C, and, as Offertorium, the Bach-Gounod 'Ave Maria.' Strange bed-fellows, surely!—— The series of orchestral concert-lectures for school children, directed by Mr. Herbert Wiseman for the Edinburgh Education Authority and Messrs. Paterson, go from strength to strength. The feature of the sixth of the present series was the successful presentation to the children of Beethoven's eighth Symphony.——Miss Jean Summers (soprano) and Mr. Chester Henderson ('cello) gave a joint recital, of which the most interesting item was Rachmaninov's 'Cello Sonata.

Glasgow.—Concerts of part-songs were given during the month by the Glasgow Select Choir (Mr. Herbert G. Cross, conductor), the William Morris Choir (Mr. James B. Houston), the Ingram Choir (a warehouse choir, conducted by Mr. W. Nisbet), the St. George Co-operative Choir (Mr. W. Wilson), and Partick Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Robert Howie). —— Glasgow University Choral Society sang Mozart's Motet, 'Laudate Dominum,' some 16th-century madrigals, and modern part-songs. Miss Helen Henschel sang solos (she is now an annual event at this concert), and Mr. A. M. Henderson conducted and played pianoforte solos.——An entire programme of Mr. Harry Hodge's pianoforte compositions was played by Mr. Robert Taylor to a large and appreciative audience, a Toccatina for two pianofortes having to be repeated. Mr. Hodge is an enthusiastic and clever Glasgow-Edinburgh amateur with a veritable passion for Bach.——The Glasgow Y.M.C.A. Choir, a large body of young singers safely led by Mr. Hugh Hunter, sang Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.'——The Glasgow Amateur Orchestra, at its spring concert, played, under the competent direction of Mr. Peebles Conn, a Purcell-Hurlstone Suite for strings, Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, and other items, and collaborated with Mr. Robert Taylor in a creditable performance of Rachmaninov's second Pianoforte Concerto.——Public interest in the recently-formed junior section of the Glasgow Orpheus Choir may be judged by the fact that three thousand people attended the first concert, and an additional five or six hundred failed to secure seats. The junior choir, eighty strong, directed by Mrs. Catherine Armstrong, sang entirely from memory about twenty unison, two-part, and three-part songs of high quality and contrast, and the 'Sangspiel' (consisting of some thirty juveniles) presented action-songs, singing games, and Scottish country dances under Miss Janey Stewart, and gave an exhibition of eurhythmic dancing and plastic action under Miss Ella Voysey, of the Madge Atkinson School, Manchester. The cumulative effect of the whole programme, combining beauty of tone, line, diction, motion, and imaginative spontaneity, was such as to raise the large audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.——A performance of Rheinberger's Concerto for organ, strings, and horns gave interest to a chamber concert arranged by the Glasgow Society of Organists.—— At the last of the Max Mossel concerts, the English Singers gave great delight. The recent changes in personnel have much improved their blend, balance, and smoothness of line. Miss Isolde Menges played with splendid capacity and musicianship, but could, with substantial advantage, devote a little attention to her platform manner.—— Paderewski reappeared after an interval of a dozen years, and, with a packed and uplifted audience to play to, had a success for which 'sensational' is the only appropriate adjective.——Mr. Plunket Greene and the Kennedy Frasers have given recitals, with all that these stand for. ——We do not often hear so interesting a débûtante as Miss Doris Dutson, a young London mezzo-contralto, who introduced herself to Glasgow in a wide range of songs—British, French, German, Italian, and 'nursery.' She has a beautiful voice, and many virtues besides.——The Glasgow Orpheus Choir sang to large audiences at Dundee (two conseeutive concerts), Dumfries, Falkirk, and Kilmarnock.

Other Towns.—Kirkcaldy Musical Society, under the competent and experienced direction of Mr. Charles M. Cowe, sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan' and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.'——Kelso Choral Union sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' Mrs. J. F. Brown conducting.——Paisley Ladies' Choir (Mr. H. E. Baker) gave a concert of part-songs and solos.

Music in Wales

Aberystwyth.—At the College Thursday concerts the following items have been given: at the hundred and sixty-sixth concert, on February 19, Trios by Beethoven (Op. 1, No. 3) and Brahms (Op. 87), and a group of pianoforte solos, including 'Noel,' by Balfour Gardiner; at the hundred and sixty-seventh concert, on March 5, B. J. Dale's Romance from Suite for viola and pianoforte (played by Mr. Raymond Jeremy) and String Quintets by Mozart (G minor), and Brahms (G major, Op. 111).

Bangor.—The College weekly concerts have now reached a total of eighty-seven. At the eighty-seventh concert, given on March 12, Herbert Howells's Pianoforte Quartet in A minor was heard for the first time, as well as the Quartet for flute and strings in D major (Mozart).—— On February 12 and 13 a miniature Festival devoted to Welsh music was held at the College. Dr. Lloyd Williams (Aberystwyth) gave lectures on 'Welsh Musical History,' and 'Traditional Welsh Songs and their Characteristics.' The programme of the weekly concert on February 12 consisted of Welsh music, including String Quartets by Heber Evans and Hubert Davies, and Trios by E. T. Davies, and a highly interesting and illuminating programme of Welsh folk-songs was given on February 13.——A special orchestral and choral concert was given at the College on March 20. The chief items were the 'Egmont' Overture, Haydn's 'London' Symphony, and a Suite for strings by Mozart. Madrigals and part-songs were sung by the College choir. Six hundred school-children were present. ——Under the auspices of the Music Department, the Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Hamilton Harty, gave a magnificent concert at the College on their way home from an Irish tour. The performance of the Brahms C minor Symphony, No. 1, will long be remembered.——Two Musical Club concerts have been given, the first by Mr. Harold Samuel and Mr. Ivor James (violoncello), and the other on March 11 by the Virtuosi Quartet, which was joined by Mr. Charles Draper in the Brahms Clarinet Quintet.

Cardiff.—On February 21, Capt. Anthony, Registrar of the University of Wales, gave a lecture to the Société Franco-Anglaise on the old songs of Brittany, with musical and lantern-slide illustrations, and pointed out the similarity between Breton and Welsh folk-music.——The weekly chamber music concerts at University College prove attractive both to 'town and gown.' On January 24 the programme included John Ireland's 'Phantasie Trio' in A minor and Beethoven's Trio in D major, Op. 79. On February 7 the College Trio gave Frank Bridge's 'Second Set of Miniature Trios.' On February 14 the concert was mainly vocal, including Holst's part-songs for female voices, 'The swallow leaves her nest' and 'Sweet and low.' On February 28 a number of Welsh songs and a setting of an old cywydd by Dr. David Evans, together with the part-song, 'Y Mebyn Od' (E. T. Davies), were sung, and instrumental items written by students were a feature.—— On March 12 University College Choral Society gave its twenty-first annual concert, which comprised the College Song, Elgar's choral 'Serenade,' several 'Liebeslieder' (Brahms), and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.' Bach's Concerto in D minor for three pianofortes and orchestra was also performed. Prof. David Evans conducted. The programme for the occasion contained an interesting list of standard classical and modern choral works performed during the last twenty-one years, some of which have also been given at special services in Llandaff Cathedral.

Newport.—On March 3, Sir Walford Davies gave a concert-lecture on Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms, and pointed out Beethoven's use of perspective (or its musical equivalent) in his works. The programme, played by himself (pianoforte), Miss Evelyn Cooke (violin), and Mr. Arthur Williams ('cello), comprised Beethoven's Trio in D major, Op. 70, No. 1, Bach's Suite in C major, for 'cello alone, and Brahms's Trio in C minor, Op. 100.

Pencoed.—On February 18, Pencoed Choral Society, with the assistance of Mr. Herbert Ware's Cardiff Orchestra, gave a performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and Gounod's 'Faust.' Mr. David Rees conducted, and Mr. Lewys James was the baritone soloist.

Pengam.—Choirs in the rural districts of Wales are making progress in opera. A few days ago St. David's Operatic Society performed 'Il Trovatore' on four successive nights. All the characters were taken by amateurs, who seem to have acquitted themselves well under the direction of Mr. Edgar Davies.

Pwllheli.—The musical committee of this year's National Eisteddfod at Pwllheli has completed arrangements for the Eisteddfod concerts. One evening will be devoted to a performance of 'The Messiah' by the Eisteddfod choir, and a new Welsh opera 'Gwenllian' (words by 'Eurwedd' and T. Gwynn Jones, music by David de Lloyd), will be performed in concert form. The Welsh Symphony Orchestra has been engaged to accompany at all concerts at the Eisteddfod.

Musical Notes from Abroad

GERMANY

MANUEL DE FALLA AS PIANOFORTE COMPOSER

Among the composers whose fame has grown up in the last decade outside Germany, Manuel de Falla holds an important place. He is nearly unknown in Germany, where Spanish music is regarded as consisting only of folk-songs and dances. Some examples of Spanish music produced in the meantime have not helped to remove this prejudice. But the production of de Falla's 'Three-Cornered Hat' by the Russian Ballet, under Diaghilev, some months ago, aroused considerable attention, showing for the first time that Spanish music, far from meaning mere entertainment, contributed to the development of modern music as represented by Stravinsky and his followers. A great audience therefore came to the Berlin Blüthner-Saal to hear Walter Gieseking play de Falla's 'Nights in the Spanish Gardens.' These so-called 'symphonic impressions' proved rather disappointing to those who had expected something exciting, like the composer's ballet, for what is here called symphonic afforded only some agreeably diverting moments. The colour of the piece pleased the hearers very much, the more so as Gieseking gave new proofs of his special faculty for drawing all possible shadings and nuances from the keyboard. Thus the composer had less success than the player. The same concert brought a new Pianoforte Concerto by Julius Kopsch, conductor of the orchestra for the evening. It proved music of the solid, German type, marred only by excesses of a would-be genius. As Kopsch is nothing more than a sound, bourgeois musician, this considerably damaged the good impression of the Concerto.

FURTWÄNGLER'S PROGRAMMES

Having returned from England and the United States, Furtwängler seems to have lost something of his good taste in forming his programmes; he adopts the method of heaping together all possible and incoherent things in a Philharmonic scheme. As in all other respects he seems to have become more simple, more free from pose than ever, he will surely very soon resume his former habitual happy choice of programmes. At a recent concert he surprised his hearers by combining the two composers Georg and Robert Schumann, the latter of whom overshadowed the other. Georg apparently belongs to the 20th century, but apart from the date there is nothing new in his 'Handel Variations.' The best part was the Handel subject itself, taken from the 'Harmonious Blacksmith,' whereas the Variations revealed a certain monotony very hostile to this variety of composition. Georg Schumann is the director of the Singakademie Choir.

GERHARD VON KEUSSLER'S ORATORIO 'JESUS AUS NAZARETH'

This biblical oratorio received its first performance with the choir of the Singakademie, under Georg Schumann. Von Keussler is certainly representative among the cultivated minds in Germany, and combines in himself a mastery of arts and sciences not generally found united in the same individual. Herein, perhaps, lies the reason why his musical ideas seem lacking in spontaneity, for facile art is apt to find only stumbling-blocks in qualities outside its sphere. The text of this oratorio is written by the composer himself, who is the exemplar of an idealist. The music as a whole is rich in edifying and beautiful passages, but it becomes tiresome in its length. The best sections are probably the Chorales, which are worked out in a manner at once clever and often new. The scarcity of oratorio among the musical creations of our period gives this event a certain importance, though the performance itself did not contribute much to make 'Jesus aus Nazareth' greater than it is.

NEW FRENCH CHAMBER MUSIC

Young conductors content themselves to-day with producing chamber music which in former times did not need a conductor. Of course, modern chamber music is very different from the old kind, for every instrument is made to represent an individual, and the ensemble has to be united in a common idea. Walter Herbert is a very enterprising adherent of the young school of conductors. He gathered the best wind-players, viz., those of the Berlin Staatsoper, to play some new French works. For a long time no recent French music had been heard in German concert-rooms, and it was Igor Stravinsky who seems to have opened the path for French composers. His Octet, which at the Salzburg Festival had produced a striking effect, was again the best example of the new chamber music style, a style which has nothing to do with atonality. Strange it is how this piece of music, which at Salzburg last year had been welcomed as something novel, now gives one the impression of being very simple and nearly classic. The performance under Stravinsky himself had had more rhythmic decision than this of Herbert's, for the composer remembered his abhorrence of romantic shadings. Other items in the programme were Florent Schmitt's Air and Scherzo, a very inoffensive but formally excellent composition, like most of this musician's output; Darius Milhaud's fifth Symphony, which was less novel than many had expected; and Kurt Weils's 'Frauentanz,' the cycle of songs on mediæval texts that was made known at the Salzburg Festival.

When, after a while, we heard Schönberg's 'Chamber' Symphony at another concert, we found it very old, for everything seems old now that is descended from the 'Tristan' style. Of course, there are many new things in this composition, but the principal character remains untouched by them. We feel the current of Wagnerism.

SOME SINGERS

A Russian singer, Anna El-Tour, distinguished herself by some spiritual and penetrating presentations of modern songs, among which old and new English examples had been selected with excellent taste. This artist, who is a teacher of singing at Berlin, affords an exception to the rule by proving that she is really familiar with the technical and æsthetic demands of her métier. The Finnish singer Helge Lindberg, who some years ago had aroused great attention, even a sensation, by the strength of his voice and by the power of his breath, has become a cultivated baritone with a wide range of expression. He may be considered as one of the most noble exponents among this class of vocalists.

NEW YORK

The 'abomination of desolation' descended upon us when the Wagner operas were taken away from the Metropolitan in 1917. But it was inevitable, for they could not have been given at that time without the German singers, and just then the German singers inevitably had to go too. The restoration was slow. The first Wagner we had was in the concert-halls. Then came 'Parsifal' in English, followed by 'Tristan,' also in English. 'Walküre' was the first to be given in German (in the season 1921-22), and after that came 'Meistersinger' and 'Siegfried.' This season has seen the return of 'Götterdämmerung' and, last of all, 'Rheingold.' This means the complete restoration of 'The Ring,' but to the regular opera subscribers 'Rheingold' is the least attractive of the four operas, so it is doubtful if we shall have more than the one performance in the special Wagner cycle (given in the afternoon to real Wagner-lovers) this year. It is a pity, for while 'Walküre' easily retains its supremacy in the 'Ring' operas, 'Rheingold' comes second in interest to many Wagnerites. 'Siegfried,' holding our closest attention most of the time, and while we let no bar escape us, yet allows our hearts to beat normally; and 'Götterdämmerung,' with all its superb wealth of music is, as Bernard Shaw puts it, distinctly grand opera so much of the time that it does not seem wholly in keeping with the rest of the three. It is, therefore, 'Rheingold,' of which every bar demands the absorbing attention of our ears, and calls for the constant watchfulness of our eyes, that is of paramount importance as being so seldom presented to us. To have given such a satisfactory representation after a seven years' absence from the Metropolitan stage, and to have considered it worth while to give it so well, for (probably) only one performance, calls for unqualified praise. Bodanzky and his men played the music as if they had had nothing else to work on for weeks past, and while there was no star among the performers, each singer did his or her best, producing a homogeneous whole that is seldom surpassed in any of our Metropolitan productions. If we cannot have another 'Rheingold' until next winter, we can live on the memory of what we saw and heard done by Bohnen, Schutezendorf, Meader, Rothier, Mueller, Branzell, and others in this revival of Wagner's great opera.

We have also had a novelty at the Metropolitan lately—an early opera by Montemezzi, 'Giovanni Gallurese.' In the first Act there were glimmerings of the genius that was later to be revealed in 'L'Amore dei Tre Re,' but after that the music was uninteresting. There was, however, distinctly a star in the representation. Maria Mueller, the heroine of this lurid drama, is not only fair to look upon, and a wonderful singer with an exceptional voice, she is also a remarkable actress, and her scenes with the outlaw whose name she has been taught to fear and despise, and whom she learns to love, and who does not reveal himself to her till towards the end of the piece, all show her to be a great acquisition to our Opera House. Lauri-Volpi, as the outlaw, might also claim to be a star, if only by virtue of endurance, as he seemed always to be on the stage and to be shouting at the top of his voice all the time. The opera was beautifully mounted, and the ballet exceptionally attractive. Montemezzi was present, receiving the plaudits of the audience, but those who came chiefly to listen felt that they must wait for 'Paul and Virginia,' if only by way of conjecture that the composer may yet give us a rival to 'L'Amore dei Tre Re.'

On the concert platform we have had the usual amount of good, bad, and indifferent offerings, but the really superbly performed masterpieces of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms, or the really bad efforts at composition by those whose names it is charitable not to expose, there is neither time nor space to discuss. A performance which deserves attention was, however, Mengelberg's wonderful exposition of Richard Strauss's 'Don Quixote.' It was the first time that the work had ever been played by the Philharmonic Orchestra, and as probably no other Philharmonic conductor could have done it so well, it may be a good thing that it was reserved for Mengelberg. 'Don Quixote' is not so well known as many of Strauss's tone-poems, and it is doubtful if it ever will be. Programme music it certainly is, but programme music that needs so much study that few listeners have (or can afford) the necessary time for its proper understanding. The ten Variations of the two-part theme of the Don and his faithful servant Sancho Panza are outlined in the programme notes. But these, as well as the Introduction and Finale, are played without any intermissions, and as every note in this subtle portrayal of Cervantes's story by music means something that every listener should understand, a very exact study of the annotated pianoforte score or very repeated hearings seem absolutely necessary for a satisfactory comprehension of Strauss's intricate work. Few concert-goers can do either, and it takes Mr. Ernest Newman's acumen to suggest a compromise, to wit the cinema! Describing some of the scenes he says: 'These, and a hundred other things, are what the "Don Quixote" connoisseur sees in the music, and what make the music seem to him such a miracle of descriptive power. To miss a single one of them is to miss the very point of the music; and evidently the plain man in the audience misses the majority of them. The cinema will have to come to the rescue.' It is quite true the plain man must miss the majority of these subtleties. Nevertheless, even the plain man could find enough pure music in the score to delight his ears and to hold his attention completely, even if filled with regrets that a clearer picture could not be painted for him to see.

Mengelberg seemed to enter thoroughly into the feelings of the composer, and to make no attempt to appear as other than a faithful interpreter.

PARIS

The Schola Cantorum, the important musical academy founded in 1896 by Charles Bordes and Vincent d'Indy, pays a yearly tribute to the second of its founders by publicly performing some of his important works which would otherwise have little chance of being heard. Such is the case with the 'Chant de la Cloche,' a dramatic legend in one prologue and seven tableaux, inspired by Schiller's famous poem bearing the same title. The score was composed between 1879 and 1883, when d'Indy, then about thirty years old, responded to the dominant influences of the time, viz., those of César Franck and of Wagner. Though a pupil of the former, d'Indy was rather attracted by the dramatic romanticism as well as by the symbolic philosophy of the latter. To state the numerous points of analogy between 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal' on the one hand and the 'Chant de la Cloche' and 'St. Christopher's Legend' on the other, would be exceeding the limited range of this column. Suffice it to say that d'Indy's Wilhelm, the master-founder of the 'Chant de la Cloche,' is the inspired originator of a new form in art very much like Walther, the ingenuous poet of 'Die Meistersinger.' In each case a genius disdains the fetters of falsely interpreted tradition. Wilhelm and Walther are the apostles of a new rule in art, and successful practice proves their inspiration to be true. The affinity between the two works extends equally to the music, d'Indy's score being endued with distinct French colour. To Wagner's powerful lyrism d'Indy opposes a fine sense of the picturesque and an archaic elegance that lend to his work a charming musical individuality.

The reappearance of Richard Strauss's name in Paris programmes must be reported with satisfaction, as it bridges definitively the artistic breach opened by the war between the two countries. Serge Kussewitzky had already given last year a fine performance of 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Piero Coppola had directed 'Ein Heldenleben.' M. Snéevoigt, a Finnish conductor not unknown abroad, presented 'Don Juan' in two consecutive performances. Since June, 1914, when Strauss's ballet, 'The Legend of Joseph,' was produced at the Paris Opéra by Diaghilev and the Russian Ballet, with Leonide Massine as a brilliant débûtant, little was known here about the more recent creations of Germany's foremost composer. Until recently the much-discussed 'Alpine' Symphony had never been heard in France. Its performance was due to Bernard Tittel, the famous Vienna and Budapest conductor. In a programme comprising only three items, viz., the Overture of 'Sakuntala,' by Goldmark, the 'Alpine' Symphony, and Ravel's 'La Valse,' Tittel kept the audience under the spell of his convincing personality. As to the 'Alpine' Symphony itself, it is generally admitted that, as programme music, it contains much that is good but more that is bad. Certain merely descriptive parts of this huge composition produce a rather gross, material sensation. Many of the themes attest to the mediocrity of the inspiration, but the consummate art in their working out wins only admiration. Within Strauss's æsthetics of the orchestra, the scoring of this Symphony may be considered a monumental achievement, and the time taken by the task—a hundred days only, it is said—a musical record.

TORONTO

Considering its choice of music, Dr. Albert Ham's National Chorus might well be named the English Choir, for not only is there shown in the programmes each year a distinct preference for ancient and modern English part-songs, but the conductor has trained his singers to a purity, charm, and simplicity of utterance which derive only from English choralism. It is gratifying to record such a condition, especially as the artistic world here is so flooded with foreigners. Three distinctive novelties were unusually well-received at the annual concert of the National Chorus recently, viz., two works by Holst, 'Lullay, my liking' and 'Love is enough,' with the Vaughan Williams 'Just as the tide was flowing' a close second. The other numbers in the programme—'All creatures now are merry-minded,' 'Like glad Cherubim' (Glinka), 'Feasting I watch' (Elgar), 'The Silent Land' (Faning), 'Bushes and Briars' (Vaughan Williams), 'The Blue Bird' (Stanford), and 'The Tempest' (Cornelius)—made a happy background for some fine playing by the London String Quartet (Beethoven, in D major, Op. 18, No. 2, and some Borodin, Mendelssohn, and Debussy). The occasion provided a capacity house, and the Londoners enjoyed their first large Toronto audience. The enthusiasm seemed to be mutual.

Oratorio came to life again a few weeks ago in the shape of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' under Dr. Edward Broome. The choir had been well-prepared and sang with vitality, the band (the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra) accompanied magnificently, and two of the soloists were well worth hearing. At the orchestral matinée on the same day, M. Nicolai Sokoloff gave a keen reading of the Tchaikovsky No. 5, followed by some intensive moments with Wagner.

Hamilton's outstanding annual event, the Elgar Choir Concerts (two nights) also discovered a (to us) new Holst work in 'King Estmere.' In two years Mr. W. H. Hewlett has done remarkable things with rather variable material, laying special stress (and Canada needs the lesson) upon sound choral technique and methods. Some interesting singing was heard in 'Matona, lovely maiden' (Lassus), 'Bushes and Briars,' 'Proud Maisie' (Pointer), 'The Sun Worshippers' (Goring Thomas), 'My bonny lass' (Morley), 'The Swing' (Palmgren), 'Go, song of mine' (Elgar), and 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' (Bach). The Cleveland Orchestra played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, the 'Tannhäuser' Bacchanale, 'March of the Sardar' (Ippolitov-Ivanov), and Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' No. 3.

The New Symphony Orchestra has this month treated quite large audiences to two memorable performances—one, of the Bach D minor Concerto, played by the brilliant Russo-American girl-pianist, Gitta Gradova, and the other, of the Brahms Symphony No. 2, a work which has not been heard here as long as most of us can remember. Dr. Albert Ham's dainty and tuneful 'Three Dances in the Old Style,' Dvorák's 'Carnival Overture,' the Berlioz 'Rakoczy March,' Smetana's 'Vltava,' and a fervid reading of 'Celeste Aïda' by Signor Umberto Saccheti, late of the Metropolitan Opera, completed the eighth and ninth 'Twilight' programmes.

The Hart House Quartet brought its series to a close with an attractive evening of Haydn (D minor, Op. 76, No. 2), Schubert (A minor, Op. 29), and an impressive new work by C. M. Loeffler, 'Music for four stringed instruments,' in E minor. The latter contains some serious music, much of which is deeply inspired.

Moritz Rosenthal was heard in recital, and, compared with the leading pianists of this continent, was decidedly second-rate both in performance and appeal. Mark Hambourg delighted a large Saturday afternoon audience with a dramatic display of Beethoven, Schumann, and earlier composers, Frieda Hempel thrilled a moderate gathering with her beautiful artistry, Kreisler and Elman drew the best houses of the season, and Carlos Salzedo gave an attractive programme of harp music before the Women's Musical Club.

The Hambourg Concert Society (Madame Norah Drewett, Messrs. Geza de Kresz, Reginald Stewart, and Boris Hambourg) found much to inspire a well-filled hall in works of César Franck, Beethoven, Dvorák, Brahms, and Debussy. Mr. von Kunits has formed a new String Quartet (with Louis Gesensway, Phaidros Rosenfield, and Leo Smith), which he introduced in a Brahms and Beethoven programme. The Eaton Choral Society of two hundred voices, under Mr. Reginald Stewart, with the co-operation of an orchestra of seventy-five players, gave a spirited performance of Stanford's 'Revenge,' Lucy Gates and Umberto Saccheti being the soloists. The same Society also staged a clever pageant, 'Progress,' written by George Stewart. One of our most promising baritones, Mr. Leslie Holmes, a pupil of Dr. Albert Ham, made his débût in a very successful recital.

VIENNA

WILHELM KIENZL'S NEW OPERA

Wilhelm Kienzl's name as a composer remains inseparably linked with his first, and greatest, operatic success, 'Der Evanglimann.' Exactly thirty years ago this opera achieved a success in Central Europe, and subsequently on foreign stages, which rivalled that of 'Cavalleria Rusticana.' Like Mascagni's opera, 'Der Evangelimann' remained the only real success of its composer. His later works, along with his earlier chamber music, are forgotten, only 'Le Ranz des Vaches,' about twelve years ago, finding any lasting favour. On the whole, Kienzl's musical output has become a thing to be regarded with some misgivings by the high-brow musician, but beloved by the people at large for whom it was composed. Kienzl's methods and language remained unaltered during thirty years, and unaffected by changing tastes and modern ideas. His new opera, recently produced at the Staatsoper, will do little to change the prevalent views on the personality of its composer. 'Sanctissimum' is a work that seeks to combine ballet or pantomime and melodramatic recitative. Its allegorical, indeed autobiographical, plot (dealing with the sorrows and sufferings of the creative artist misjudged by men but ultimately redeemed by the Saints, who gather to dance to his melodies) is simple and direct. Kienzl's music presents no problems, but contents itself with purveying well-scored popular and tasteful melodies. As the fairies of the Danube assemble to dance to the strains of the Minstrel's music, there is a short allusion to Johann Strauss's 'Blue Danube Waltz,' and for the climax of the piece—the apotheosis of the Minstrel—Kienzl introduces two beautiful gavottes taken from Rameau's ballet-opera, 'Le Temple de la Gloire.'

Apart from this pleasing, if naive, novelty, the Staatsoper exhausted its activities in a gorgeously mounted revival of Johann Strauss's master operetta, 'The Gipsy Baron.' It was in the nature of a festival performance, and the staging was in the character of a fashion show, most elaborately prepared, but Strauss's bright and gay melodies suffered from an all-too operatic and heroic production.

A 'NEW' MOZART OPERA

Exactly a hundred and sixty-two years after its completion, Mozart's first opera, 'La finta semplice,' has now had its première, in the city for which it was originally composed by command of the Emperor Joseph II. of Austria. Mozart, then a boy of twelve years, was at the time the subject of the criticism and scepticism so often—and in many cases rightly—administered to child prodigies. Leppold Mozart's letters reveal the hostility which he felt towards his son's adversaries. The traducers of young Wolfgang ultimately succeeded in frustrating the production at Vienna of 'La finta semplice.' The opera was performed at Salzburg, in 1769, and now that it has been heard at Vienna it may not be amiss to state that those who stopped its production upwards of a century and a half ago, may, after all, have been right to some extent. The little work hardly rises above the standard of the minor composers of the day.

The present production, directed by Dirk Foch, was given to commemorate the promotion of the State Conservatory of Music to the rank of an Austrian State High School of Music, and orchestra and singers were all graduates of the institution. Joseph Marx is the first Rector of the new High School, and his inaugural speech contained some caustic and all too significant remarks concerning 'modern music' which did not seem to augur well for the sound development of the scheme.

MODERN MUSIC

Music of the radical or unusual sort is still being received at Vienna with the same antagonism that the city has in turn bestowed upon each new composer from Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Bruckner, Hugo Wolf, and Mahler, to the moderns of to-day. The first performance here of Stravinsky's 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' presented by Franz Schalk at one of the Philharmonic subscription concerts, was the occasion for a disturbance exceeding even the disgusting scenes that accompanied the first performance here, some fifteen or more years ago, of Schönberg's 'Pelléas and Mélisande.' Within the same week, however, which brought the tumultuous rejection of Stravinsky, 'Pelléas and Mélisande' was received with respectful silence when Dirk Foch, the new musical director of the Konzertverein, performed the Schönberg item at one of the Society's concerts. Fifteen years hence, the Vienna public will probably have awakened to Stravinsky, only to drown the works of his successors in a flood of cries, yells, hisses, laughter, and whistling.

The inclusion of so radically modern a composition in the repertory marks an epoch in the history of the Philharmonic Orchestra and of Vienna's musical life. The reception accorded to 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' and which even resulted in violent behaviour among the listeners, is not encouraging for the cause of modern music in the Austrian capital, where the local section of the International Society for Contemporary Music still remains the only stronghold for progressive musical ideas. The efforts of this group of young musicians remain limited in their effect to a comparatively small circle of enthusiastic adherents, but their pioneer work is of great importance. The latest of the Society's monthly concerts offered Vienna the first opportunity of hearing Frederick Delius's Sonata No. 2, for violin and pianoforte (a piece which may not strictly be called 'modern' in the accepted sense of the term), and Arthur Honegger's Sonata for 'cello and pianoforte, to which the adjective may be applied only in a limited sense. The second movement of Honegger's piece is apparently a concession to the French taste of the late 'nineties, with its preference for the melodies of a César Franck or Gabriel Fauré; but the first movement, and especially the last, are strong, virile, and intensely interesting music.

Equally interesting, if entirely different in mood and conception, were Anton von Webern's Three Pieces for 'cello and pianoforte. As always with this disciple of Schönberg, the pieces are exceedingly short in duration, evasive in their melodic outline, and elusive in their colouring. Spiritually they defy analysis. The hearer may or may not be able to perceive behind these plaintive, wailing, moaning tones their subtle atmospheric content—or, as is often the case, hear more than a mere series of seemingly senseless soft tones. Musically, however, the matter stands quite differently: inspection of the score discloses a network of motives and phrases which, in the course of each small piece, the composer inverts and transforms with infinite craft. The fact remains undisputed that this music, however problematic, held a large audience spell-bound, and anxious for an immediate repetition.

At the same concert, Egon Wellesz's new Suite No. 2, for 'cello solo, proved a series of four short pieces conceived for the most part in the classic form; and, moreover, in the Siciliana of the third movement, having a romantic flavour quite new with this erudite composer.

It is strange to find romantic elements prevalent in the compositions of Joseph Matthias Hauer, for he, like Schönberg, is a devotee of the twelve-tone scale. But Hauer goes far beyond Schönberg, for he would establish the twelve-tone scale to the total abolition of the seven-tone system. His ideas are expounded in several books and articles, and are stated in an often fantastic but unfailingly logical form; yet on hearing his music one is ever again surprised that so little of the composer's revolutionary theory is practically embodied in it. An entire evening devoted to Hauer ('Five Pieces for String Quartet'; three sets of songs based on poems of Hölderlin; three short pieces for clarinet and pianoforte entitled 'Schalmeien') proved rather monotonous and quite tame. His monotony seems rooted in his principle of forming each of his themes of the twelve tones and repeating it over and over in exactly the same order. Most of the music heard was entirely homophonic and primitive. Some violin pieces, however, in which theory is cast to the winds for the sake of sheer, unalloyed inspiration, furnished evidence of a strong talent and musical temperament.

Contemporary music of a less sophisticated sort was represented in a cycle, 'Songs of Love, Faith, and Matrimony,' by Julius Bittner, the Austrian composer who, although on a higher literary plane, shows some kinship to the popular tendencies of Kienzl. Both words and music are Bittner's own product, and comprise an appealing human document of good melodic invention. Emilie Bittner, a fine contralto singer, shared with Oscar Jölli, the baritone, the interpretation of her husband's songs.

Twenty years after its composition, Frederick Delius's 'A Mass of Life' has received its first performance at the hands of Paul von Klenau, who is shortly to conduct the work in London. Delius's score is noble and beautifully lyrical if, perhaps, lacking in rhythmic contrast, and not fully commensurate with the philosophical trend of his book, which is taken from Nietzsche's 'Thus spake Zarathustra.' It shows the influence of Wagner, Strauss, and of impressionism, and is a grateful work for the performers—a solo quartet and an eight-part chorus.

PAUL BECHERT.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

MARCO ENRICO BOSSI, the famous Italian organist and composer. His death took place at sea, a few weeks ago, when travelling from New York to Havre. He was born at Lake Salò, Lake Garda, on April 25, 1861. Bossi was one of the few Italian composers of his time to devote his talents mainly to symphonic and other forms of non-operatic music. This may have been due to the comparative failure of his early efforts for the stage, but was more probably the result of extensive travel during his youth, when he came under the influence of musical activities that were wider in scope than those of his native land. He had to his credit a long list of choral and instrumental works, but in this country his fame rests almost entirely on his organ music. This is easily the best of any hitherto written in Italy, combining a natural gift for melody with a solidity of construction and a seriousness of aim that obviously derived from his studies, as a player, of Bach. He was a successful concert organist, and had just finished a brief recital tour in America when he began the voyage during which he died.

GEORGE W. HAMMOND, at Acton, on February 26, in his eighty-sixth year. He was a link in many ways with the musical life of the last century, having been a contemporary and associate of Sterndale Bennett, Sullivan, Macfarren, Holmes, and other notable English musicians; as a young man he had played duets with Clara Schumann. At the age of eleven he deputized for his father (an organist at Southampton); at twelve he gained the praise of Sterndale Bennett for his playing of a Beethoven Sonata; at fourteen he became a student at the Royal Academy of Music, and in 1856, at the age of sixteen, he competed for the then newly-founded Mendelssohn Scholarship, and gained honourable mention. (Among the other competitors were two young men who were afterwards to become famous, Arthur Sullivan, who gained the scholarship, and Joseph Barnby.) At a later date he studied harmony and composition under Sir George Macfarren, for whom he acted for some years as honorary amanuensis.

MORITZ MOSZKOWSKI, on March 7, at Paris. He was born at Breslau, in 1854, but was of Polish origin. Most of his life was spent in France. Moszkowski was a brilliant pianist, and his best compositions were for his instrument. Many of his works—e.g., the 'Spanish Dances' and 'From Foreign Parts'—have long enjoyed an immense and well-deserved popularity. Unfortunately the composer was unable to derive full benefit from the sale of his music, owing to his having disposed of the copyrights and invested the proceeds in Russian, Polish, and German securities. As a result, the end of the war found him penniless, and his last years were spent in penury and ill-health.

ARTHUR JOHN HADRILL, at Eltham, on March 2, aged sixty-four. He was a busy organist and teacher, hon. secretary of the Music Teachers' Association, and a prominent and popular figure at the Vacation Courses of the Training School for Music Teachers.

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

WHAT WAS THE 'CREATION KEY'?

BAND SERGEANT writes: 'What is the "Creation Key," and its origin? The question has been asked at Kneller Hall on several occasions, and I imagine it must be a key on the bassoon used in Haydn's "Creation."'—You are very near the mark. The 'Creation Key' is an extra key on the wing-joint of the bassoon, which when open gives the high G:

Ex. 1.
A bassoon-playing friend tells us that the key was so called because it enables a certain passage in 'The Creation' to be played easily. Without this key there would be some awkward 'forking.' So far as we can learn the actual passage is:

Ex. 2.  &c.

which occurs at the close of the air, 'On mighty pens.' It looks easy, but apparently the trouble is in the rapid alternation of E and G legato. The term 'Creation Key,' so far as we know, appears in no musical dictionary.

DIAPASON.—(1.) We were very much interested in your letter, particularly in the description of your sudden discovery that you had transposed a hymn-tune without knowing it. We advise you to develop this useful faculty. In regard to memorising, you say you find it difficult unless you 'play the piece through countless times.' This 'playing through countless times' suggests that there is a lack of mental application and method. Try memorising a single bar at a time, not by playing through over and over again, but by looking at it, trying to realise the mental effect, and then testing the result with keyboard and copy. This develops the mental hearing of the music, which is a valuable aid in memorising. The parrot-like memorising that results from endless repetition is liable to fail when the slightest distraction interferes with the performance. (2.) You ask if any benefit can be derived from correspondence lessons in harmony, &c. Such instruction is almost, if not quite, as good as oral tuition, so long as it is confined to such subjects as can be dealt with on paper. The diploma about which you inquire is the Associate in Music, Trinity College. We have no Trinity College syllabus before us, so we cannot say what is required. Write to the College for a copy, and if you think the subjects are within your grasp, take up the matter again with the correspondence college with which you have already been in communication. But surely in a large town such as yours, there must be a good teacher who can give you oral instruction, which is always to be preferred. Write to us again in a few months' time, and report progress.

ORGAN STUDENT.—(1.) Yes; the songs were evidently from the 'Schemelli' Song Book, published by Novello. (2.) There are several memory courses advertised in the Musical Times. You could not do better than write for particulars. (3.) Mr. Ernest Newman writes for the Sunday Times, the Glasgow Herald, and the Daily Graphic; Mr. Percy Scholes for the Observer; and Mr. Edwin Evans for the Liverpool Post and Mercury. (4) Full scores can be borrowed from the Novello Circulating Music Library. (5.) The pianoforte teacher in your district who, besides being a bronze and silver medallist, flaunts the following letters after her name—A.Mus.S.S.L. and A.F.S.Sc.—may or may not be a first-rate teacher. We express no views on that point. Like you, we are curious to know what these letters mean. We can, however, safely say that as a criterion of musical qualification they have little or no significance, even though backed up by a cap and gown.

R. C. W.—Metronome marks are of course never to be taken too literally. When you have thoroughly grasped the spirit of any piece of music a suitable pace will suggest itself. For the pieces in List A, Primary Division, Associated Board, Pianoforte, the following rates are perhaps on the slow side: Duvernoy: Study in G, Op. 176, No. 5, Allegro moderato, ♩ = 76. Diabelli: Rondo in C, Allegretto, ♩. = 60. Swinstead: 'The Midshipmite,' ♩ = 120. With a little experiment you may feel that the speed in each case might with advantage be slightly higher. Decide for yourself. As regards scales, the pupil should play them as fast as is possible without sacrificing clearness, evenness, and perfect control. Obviously, in such an elementary examination as this, examiners will look more for sound methods than for excessive speed.

H. S.—(1.) For obvious reasons we cannot recommend teachers. If, in such a town as Birmingham, you cannot find a teacher good enough, we fear you must be unduly hard to please. Write to the secretary of the Birmingham and Midland Institute School of Music (Mr. H. M. Francis, Paradise Street, Birmingham) for a prospectus. (2.) The best books on early ornamentation, we think, are Dolmetsch's 'Interpretation of the Music of the 17th and 18th Centuries' (Novello, 15*s*.) and Dannreuther's 'Ornamentation' (Novello, books 1 and 2, 7*s*. 6*d*. each). A good deal of information of the methods of early Italian singers in regard to the embellishment of melodies can be found in such books as Manuel Garcia's 'Treatise on the Art of Singing' (Leonard, 6*s*.). We do not know the Tosi book you mention. Please note we do not answer inquiries through the post.

G. G. C.—Yes; you should certainly study counterpoint and harmony at the same time, as Stanford suggests. Try Bridge's 'Counterpoint' (Novello), and as an example of a more recent work on the subject, Kitson's 'Applied Counterpoint' (Oxford University Press). For your particular needs, which we gather are not in the direction of examinations so much as composition, you should do as much as possible of free contrapuntal harmonizing of melodies, and working out fugal expositions.

G. K.—In our opinion the 'best all-round edition of Bach's organ works' is that issued by Novello. It is particularly good in regard to the Chorale Preludes, as one of the books in the series contains all the tunes treated in Bach's Chorale Preludes, with a translation of the verse or verses of the hymn to which the Chorale was sung. The student is thus enabled to understand some pieces which would otherwise be obscure.

J. T. A.—We have tried in vain to discover whether Haydn's arrangements of Scots songs (made in 1810, for G. Thompson, of Edinburgh) are still published. Perhaps some reader may be able to tell us if they can still be obtained, and where.

G. E. H.—In judging violins, as in everything else, put not your trust in labels! If your violin is a good one, and appears to be well stricken in years, your best plan is to obtain expert advice as to its value. Write to Messrs. W. E. Hill, New Bond Street, W.1.

Canadian.—Any Organ Concertos should suit your purposes—e.g., those of Handel, Harwood in D, Horatio Parker in E flat minor, and Rheinberger in F. All the above may be had through Novello. Suitable Pianoforte Concertos are too well-known to need mention.

Neophyte.—The best book on the operas, so far as we know, is the 'Complete Opera Book,' by Kobbé (Putnams, 15*s*.). It gives not only the stories, but many music-type illustrations. We think you will find this will meet your needs in regard to the Wagner operas.

In our January issue we told a correspondent ('T. S. M.') that 'there exists no periodical that makes a feature of information in regard to violin literature.' We regret that in saying this we overlooked the Strad. We have pleasure in drawing the attention of 'T. S. M.' and others interested in string matters to our contemporary.

MENTAL-HEARING AND HOW TO ACQUIRE IT.

A Pupil writes: "I am well satisfied that your system will be of great service to me. The paper on 'How to study mentally' is very valuable, and I am most glad to have it."

THE ability to HEAR MENTALLY seems to be possessed by few students, as the following from a well-known Musical Paper proves:

"Harmony on paper is a dead thing except to those who can hear what they see—the possession of about one student in a thousand."

Mental-hearing will enable the student to hear in his mind the sounds of the notes he is writing on the paper; they will not be mere soundless signs, but each will convey a definite sound to him, and until they do so all written harmony is a waste of time.

The acquisition of Mental-hearing will materially assist the practical work of the pianoforte and organ student, for if the student can hear mentally he will be encouraged to study mentally. Mental-hearing is the key to mental study, and Mental study is the key to more rapid progress. The mastery of this subject will also improve the student's sight-reading, memorising, and transposing.

Mental-hearing is a necessity for candidates for Diplomas such as L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., A.R.C.O., &c., and this work will also be of the greatest help to pupils preparing aural tests for the Associated Board Examinations.

CAPTAIN STRATTON'S FANCY.

BALLAD FOR BARITONE SOLO WITH CHORUS.

Set to Words by JOHN MASEFIELD.

By CYRIL JENKINS.

THE recent contributions of Mr. Cyril Jenkins to modern choral music have so firmly established him in the forefront of contemporary choral composers that any new work emanating from his pen claims serious consideration from all who are interested in the development of part-singing, along original lines. In this splendid setting of John Masefield's poem, the composer gives us virile music that is eminently fitted for the robust character that it depicts. The rousing solo and the chorus, that is a real chorus such as our fathers used to sing with gusto, is conceived in just the right atmosphere for broad effects. This is music with something of the tang of the salt sea and the bite of the Jamaica puncheon that made life worth living for the "old bold mate of Henry Morgan."

"Of particular service are the many critical summaries of the different nations' activities in different departments, and also the very full reference lists of music and of books. . . . The articles are very satisfactorily sound and sober, telling us without unnecessary trimmings what we want to know."—The Times.

"We have had no book on similar lines so likely to be useful since J. S. Shedlock's edition of Riemann went out of print a quarter of a century ago. A multitude of readers will find a great joy in Sir Henry Wood's masterly article on Orchestral Colour . . . . brilliantly informative."—Daily Telegraph.

"The work has been thoroughly done. Not the least valuable feature of the book is the article on 'Harmony.' . . . . Its value is undoubted."—Yorkshire Post.

HANDBOOKS FOR MUSICIANS
Edited by ERNEST NEWMAN.

THE ORGAN WORKS OF BACH
BY HARVEY GRACE

Cloth, gilt, xviii. + 319 pages.
WITH OVER TWO HUNDRED MUSICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.
Price ... ... Nine Shillings net.

Extracts from MR. ERNEST NEWMAN'S Introduction.

"This is, I think, the first systematic and comprehensive English book on the Organ works of Bach."

"The prime value of Mr. Harvey Grace's book is that it appeals both to the organist and to the eager reader of organ works. . . ."

"It impresses the non-organist as the work of a man who sees his Bach in relation to all other music, ancient and modern. . . ."

"This is the book of a worshipper, but not of a blind worshipper. . . . Mr. Grace's frankness towards Bach's lapses inspires confidence in his judgment as a whole. No other book with which I am acquainted gives us so connected a picture of Bach as an organ composer."

"The student of musical technique, no less than the student of Bach, will learn a good deal from Mr. Grace's book."

"It was very much wanted, and now that it has arrived it proves to be the best book on the subject we have ever seen. . . . One would like to dwell lovingly on every stage of this monumental work did space permit, but it will only allow of a general commendation of every word from the beginning . . . to the end, which consists of music to accompany the rhythmic physical exercises."—The Morning Post, February 17, 1922.

"No teacher of singing should be without this wonderful book."—Musical Opinion.

"This is a thoughtful and thought-compelling book which touches life at most points. Eurhythm the author defines as perfect harmony, and discusses with a fine enthusiasm the practical means of bringing about in the individual this desirable condition. The book should be of great value to teachers of singing and physical education, while the intelligent student can also derive great benefit from a careful reading."—Glasgow Herald.

OLD ENGLISH
VIOLIN MUSIC

EDITED BY

ALFRED MOFFAT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

Although considerable attention has been given to the resuscitation of Church Music, Glees and Madrigals, Organ and even Harpsichord Music by the older English composers, very little has been done to make known the large mass of music for the Violin written by English musicians from the time of Purcell to the close of the 18th century. These works for the most part consist of Suites or Sonatas written for a solo violin with a figured bass, or for two violins and violoncello with a figured bass for the harpsichord or organ; another favourite form was the Concerto grosso.

It is with the object of making known to the public a selection of the best of these compositions that the present series has been undertaken.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE TWO SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

HANDBOOK OF MINIATURE ORCHESTRAL AND CHAMBER MUSIC SCORES.

COMPLETE LIST OF PUBLISHED MINIATURE SCORES WITH A

THEMATIC LIST

OF CLASSICAL ORCHESTRAL AND CHAMBER WORKS.

PREFACE BY

SIR HENRY J. WOOD.

Price, 1s. post free.

No music-lover should be without this Handbook, which is not only a complete catalogue of published miniature scores of orchestral and chamber music of all schools and countries, but a valuable guide through the whole literature of such music. The copious thematic list is a particularly valuable feature of the booklet, while Sir Henry J. Wood's preface imparts to it, as it were, an official sanction as a serious and trustworthy publication.

THE RIVARDE SCHOOL OF VIOLIN PLAYING

THE PRINCIPLES

OF PURE VIOLIN TONE-PRODUCTION are seldom realised and still more seldom taught. Unfortunately, the importance of the first stages of violin playing is not generally recognised by parents, and children rarely have the opportunity of receiving good training until their schooldays are over, by which time so-called "scraping" habits are well ingrained.

THE METHODS

by which Mr. Rivarde hopes to advance the object of his school are the following:—

1. By substituting a scientifically demonstrable method of tone-production and left-hand technique in place of the experimental methods usually adopted.

2. By training players for public careers, thereby enabling music lovers to appreciate the results of the application of his methods.

3. By arranging special training courses for teachers and giving certificates of recommendation to those who are able to prove their ability to demonstrate and impart to others the principles of the Rivarde School of Violin Playing.

4. By giving particular attention to children, and arranging for supervision of practice when possible.

By thus creating a demand for a higher standard of violin playing, teachers will be enabled to obtain posts throughout the country, thereby giving musical children the advantage of good lessons from the very beginning.

THREE SCHOLARSHIPS

are offered, giving

FREE TUITION.

These Scholarships open to

1. International Competition up to 14 years of age.

MODERN CORR. COLLEGE

20, SHERWIN ROAD, NOTTINGHAM.

JUST THE HELP YOU NEED.

A REAL SCHOOL OF MODERN PIANOFORTE PLAYING.

Mus. Doc., Oxon., F.R.C.O. writes:
"Your teachings are of such benefit that I shall not fail to speak of them whenever I have the opportunity. I think I have said so before, but your collection of lessons constitutes a REAL SCHOOL OF MODERN PIANOFORTE PLAYING."

FINGERWORK.

L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M. writes:
"As for FINGERWORK, your advice has opened up a 'NEW WORLD OF EASE' to me. My pupils are making WONDERFUL PROGRESS on your lines."

A Pianist writes:
"I have to thank you for your WONDERFUL lesson on OCTAVES. It is marvellous how easily and rapidly one can play after studying your method."

THE CHARLES A. GILLETT CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS ARE UNIQUE AND DISTINCTIVE, being quite out of the ordinary rut. The remarkable letters of appreciation from the musician with the university degree to the ordinary beginner prove conclusively that this method is an advance in the rapid development of modern pianoforte playing

Perfect Touch & Technique without Laborious Practice

The fundamental principles of my System have stood the test of time. Proof of this lies in the enormous number of pupils who have passed through my hands to piano-mastery—who have found in the System the Royal Road to the whole of the practical side of Pianoforte Playing, without any keyboard drudgery.

The results are frequently described by pupils as "miraculous," "magical," &c.

Pianists of every grade of proficiency can benefit from this simple, inexpensive, and unique Postal Course. Many eminent musicians, including the late Sir Frederick Bridge, have used and highly recommended my System—the ORIGINAL POSTAL SYSTEM.

19,000 Successful Pupils of all ages.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's
System of Pianoforte Playing.

Read my Illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing."

This explains fully how I teach the System by a Series of Postal Lessons, and gives particulars of the very reasonable fee for tuition. No apparatus or special music necessary—just an easily acquired method with much quicker and better results, based on my important discovery in physiology.

Apply for book to-day, but please do not omit to state whether average or advanced player, or, if a beginner, whether you can or cannot play at sight a simple hymn-tune. The book will be sent free of charge and post free.

VOICE-PRODUCTION AND SINGING.
TRAINING FOR OPERA AND CONCERTS.
PUPILS PREPARED FOR A.R.C.M. AND L.R.A.M. EXAMS.

"Mr. Garcia—himself a fine artist and the inheritor of a great tradition and a great name—has some most promising pupils. It was particularly pleasant to hear voices, so well placed and well poised, smooth and even in tone, from the lowest to the highest notes, showing a control which too few learn to exercise."—Daily Telegraph.

MANUEL GARCIA'S "ART OF SINGING" has recently been edited and revised from the original edition by ALBERT GARCIA.

Publishers: Messrs. LEONARD & Co., 47, Poland Street, W.1 Price 6*s*.

"A work that should be of interest to all singers, young or old, is Albert Garcia's newly-published edition of his grandfather's 'Art of Singing.' There are many famous cases of inherited talents in the arts, but not many where the same branch of the profession has been followed by successive generations, and the case of the Garcias is probably unique."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Albert Garcia, who comes of a famous line of singing teachers, has re-edited the treatise of the great Garcia, his grandfather—the admirable old man who departed only recently (in 1906), after more than half a century of eminent educational labours in London. The value of the book, with its exercises and the various bits of traditional lore which it contains, is considerable."—Morning Post.

"Garcia's Treatise has stood the test of time so well that a new edition needs little more than mention. The revision has been done by the author's grandson. Looking at these large pages of exercises corresponding to the purely technical studies of the pianist, one sees through the secret of the permanent results of the old thorough-going methods of training."—Musical Times.

"In its present form it is one of the most practical and valuable treatises on the art extant."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"Garcia's 'Art of Singing.' This well-known treatise, by one of the most famous teachers of singing, is issued in a revised edition by the grandson of the great Manuel Garcia. It is a complete theoretical and practical guide to the art of singing."—Liverpool Post.

to-day.

THERE are thousands of capable musicians, both amateur and professional, who just fall short of being really good performers through their inability to trust their memory.

They realise their weakness, they are always sensitive of their incompleteness and disheartened at their inefficiency.

My booklet, which I offer free of cost or obligation, explains in an interesting way the system by which in a short correspondence course how to play from memory with ease and certainty.

If you can play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ, send a post-card for my Booklet entitled the which includes copies of signed and addressed testimonials from grateful pupils in all parts of the Country.

MASTER-METHOD OF MEMORY-PLAYING,

Separate and distinct courses for each of the above instruments—just state which you play.

THE ART OF VOICE-TRAINING

SUMMER HOLIDAY COURSE IN LONDON.

MR. F. C. FIELD HYDE

Will conduct his HOLIDAY COURSE in LONDON from JULY 30th to AUGUST 8th.

It will include

LECTURES ON THE ART OF VOICE-TRAINING.

A CRITICAL REVIEW OF ALL THE CHIEF THEORIES OF VOICE-PRODUCTION.

LECTURES ON THE TEACHING OF SONG INTERPRETATION.

VOCAL AND PRACTICAL TEACHING ILLUSTRATIONS THROUGHOUT.

For Organists, Choirmasters, and all Vocal Teachers, this Course is unique. It is the outcome of many years' investigation of practically every theory and method worth investigating, and of a wide teaching experience.

Previous courses have been attended by Teachers, Conductors, and Organists, including musicians of national reputation. Their recommendation is unanimous.

The following are spontaneous expressions from letters received from those who have attended:

"One of the most enjoyable weeks I ever spent."
"The best holiday course of many I have attended."
"The improvement in my choir has been commented upon already." (Two weeks after the course).
"It has proved one of the best investments I ever made."
"A single lecture was worth the whole fee."
"I travelled a thousand miles to attend, and the course was worth it."
"I am returning to my work full of new ideas and fresh enthusiasm."

A MUSICAL INTERLUDE IN ONE ACT

THE LIBRETTO TAKEN FROM

SHAKESPEARE'S KING HENRY IV.

THE MUSIC, FOUNDED ON OLD ENGLISH MELODIES, BY

GUSTAV HOLST

(OP. 42).

PIANOFORTE ARRANGEMENT BY VALLY LASKER.

Vocal Score, Price Six Shillings. Libretto, One Shilling.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

THE TIMES—April 4, 1925.

". . . . The dialogue moves almost at speaking pace; the tunes appear so easily that not one in ten of them would be recognised as a quotation (Holst owns to about forty borrowed tunes) if he had not shown his hand in a printed preface. The orchestration is another point of subtle interest. It is generally inconspicuous, almost always light enough to let the voice come through without effort. It never distracts attention from the play, yet Holst's skill appears in the way he clothes the thinnest harmonic outline with apt colour."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH—April 4, 1925.

". . . . The generous use Mr. Holst has made of Old English melodies garnered from the Playford, Chappell, and Cecil Sharp collections. . . . Whatever its constituents this music adds zest and momentum to the comic scenes; it rises to dignity and eloquence in the noble monologue of Prince Henry; it sets in relief every element of the last episode where the love passages of Falstaff and Doll are broken off by war alarms. . . . . The individuality of the composer emerges clear and distinct, binding together firmly the action. It is a personality compounded of great daring and great simplicity; of a modern love for sharp, slick combination of harmony and an innate bias for the song that is the people's heritage. One might almost think of Holst as a master of the Tudor period who during the eras of German hegemony in music has lain in enchanted sleep, and awakened again in the twentieth century to resume his song making with modern tools."

DAILY MAIL—April 4, 1925.

". . . . This original and exquisite little score . . . . It was no foolhardiness but a sound instinct that prompted the addition of this music to the richest and wittiest comedy scenes that ever came from pen of man. Mr. Holst's music is woven on material from the Old English country dance book. The small orchestra keeps these slight and blithe tunes chattering or murmuring, and above it the words are fitted in a rare new manner. The fine ingeniousness of it all can be judged from the score."

THE MORNING POST—April 4, 1925.

". . . . More than half of the problem which Mr. Holst has set himself has been the mating of a certain text with a certain body of tune without doing violence to either. He has succeeded, and now that the job has been done one sees how inevitable is his solution of a difficult problem, and with what extraordinary skill it has been accomplished. . . . . The real feat of the composer has been the apparent ease with which he has brought words and music together, and has allowed free play to the Shakespearean text, while adding a covering of music as delightful as it is pertinent. . . . . The curtain is Shakespeare's, but it is also Mr. Holst's in an admirably effective page of his score. In his new opera he shows again his sense of theatrical effect, both in the ingenuity with which he has arranged this episode, and in the use he makes of his orchestra."

DAILY NEWS—April 4, 1925.

". . . . Mr. Holst's method of composition is decidedly new. He has taken over forty English folk-songs, and used them as the principal element of the score, besides tunes of his own. The folk-songs are developed, combined, and transformed with surprising ingenuity."

THE SUNDAY TIMES—April 5, 1925.

". . . . The melody that Mr. Holst has invented for them [the Sonnets], beautifully free in rhythm, and remote in style yet without a suspicion of archaism, seems a natural emanation from them. His technical skill is shown in the masterly combination of this song ['Devouring Time'], later with the 'King Arthur' ballad, in a little ensemble that comes just at the right moment. One is astonished at the general congruity between Shakespeare's words and the traditional tunes."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN—April 4, 1925.

". . . . 'At the Boar's Head' is a work of genius, if only for its cleverness and the masterly way in which the words of Shakespeare are made to run in with the old and strongly rhythmical melodies of Shakespeare's own time. It is a work of genius also because it answers to the geniality of Shakespeare. . . . Mr. Holst should in this work have made friends with the man in the street."

THESE new "Cathedral" Red Waterproof Gut Strings are made specially for those players with damp and perspiring hands.

They are impregnated with a newly discovered compound which repels moisture.

Of course, being "Cathedral" strings they are of the highest quality.

The prices are wonderfully low, as you will notice. Try a set to-day. Insist on "Cathedral" brand, as substitutes will only disappoint.

THE GLASGOW ORPHEUS CHOIR

BY HARVEY GRACE

By the time these lines are in print the fifth annual visit to London of the Glasgow Orpheus Choir will have taken place. London choral enthusiasts have therefore had ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with this most famous of Scottish choirs—opportunity of which they have made the most, if crowded audiences may be taken as a sign. But probably few Southrons know much about the origin and constitution of the Choir, and still fewer are aware of the great part it plays in the musical life, not merely of Glasgow, but of a large and increasing area of Scotland itself. Recent visits to Glasgow have provided me with opportunities for obtaining information on these points, and this article is the result. Its object is not to deal with the Orpheus as a mere choir. This country is so rich in choralism that one might easily name a score of choirs, any one of which would provide ample material for an equally enthusiastic article, though the grounds of enthusiasm would probably be different.

The Glasgow Orpheus, however, is a good deal more than a choir. I believe it to be unique in some important respects, and my object here is to show in what ways it has enlarged the scope of a choral society, and to suggest to choralists elsewhere that what has been done by the Orpheus might, at least in a good measure, be achieved by other bodies, small as well as large.

HOW THE CHOIR STARTED

The origin of the Choir was set forth in entertaining fashion by Mr. Hugh S. Roberton in the programme of the tenth anniversary concert given in 1915. I cannot do better than draw pretty fully on this official, but very unconventional, history. Mr. Roberton throws it into three chapters, the first entitled 'The Wooin' o't.' Let choral conductors who are 'up against' rough material and other obstacles take heart from the following extracts:

> This is how it happened, and when and where. At the east end of Rottenrow there was a courtyard, and in the south-east corner of the courtyard a stair led down (not up) to a small hall. . . . On a certain night in the autumn of 1901 a number of men and women were gathered there to meet their new conductor. They were bright and eager. . . . They looked as if they meant business. I certainly did. I had come straight from a two years' conductorship of a recalcitrant and anæmic church choir. There I had scored a perfectly complete failure, and there I had had my failure crowned by the presentation of a nice silver-mounted baton, accompanied by some nice silver-mounted platitudes. I must have been angry. At least I was in no mood for preliminaries . . . There stood I, and there sat the Toynbee House Choir, some thirty strong.

Sitting through an Orpheus rehearsal recently, and noting the uncanny responsiveness of the hundred and forty singers, I could not but recall this account of the Toynbee thirty, facing their new conductor for the first time. Such moments are big with fate, and every choral conductor has vivid—sometimes painful—recollections of them. Let us see how 'H. S. R.' opened the ball:

> 'What piece do you know best?' I asked. 'We rock away on the billows gay,' they replied. 'Very well then,' I added, 'let's rock away.' And we rocked. They threw it at me in slabs. It seemed to me (having come straight from that church choir) like the elements let loose in a hurry. It tore on its way as a tempest gone mad. It was the loudest noise I had ever heard or ever wish to hear in the name of music, and, to be frank, it was not musical; but there was heart behind it. So after we had mopped our foreheads and adjusted our neck-gear and throat muscles, I spoke. 'Ladies and gentlemen,' I said, 'you have very strong voices—very strong, but I like you. Your singing falls on my ear as the music of Apollo's lyre, not because it is sweet or beautiful (it being neither), but because it is natural. This' [I continued], 'is the basis of all art. And, furthermore, you have enthusiasm. This, too, is well. My proposal, therefore, is that we start now to learn to sing.' It must have been at that point that a voice spake down the chimney (or was it the ventilator?), saying, 'I proclaim the banns.' At any rate, it was precisely at that moment that we took each other for better or for worse, and that is how it happened, and when and where.

EARLY FAILURE

Did the new conductor proceed to work a miracle? He did not. Again let discouraged trainers in a hurry take a lesson and courage from Chapter II. of the history, entitled, 'Married Life':

> After the wedding we settled down to work, and at the end of the season we gave a concert. The audience was small. The programme was tactfully bisected by an 'interval.' A comic singer assisted [!]. At the interval the small audience became appreciably smaller. After the comic singer's last song the small audience vanished. The audience was right. We deserved it. We had been doing foundation work, and we foolishly deceived ourselves and thought to deceive the public that the edifice was showing above the surface. We failed.

It certainly seemed as if the time was ripe for the presentation of another silver-mounted baton and a fresh set of silver-mounted platitudes! But these Toynbee House singers and their conductor meant business—especially the conductor:

> It was a fruitful failure. We set our teeth. Those were the days. My partner (the Choir) was superb. She absorbed choral technique as a young bride absorbs cookery recipes, and at the end of that second season we turned out our first choral pie. Sodden in parts, perhaps, was the paste; but there were some nice brown, crisp bits, and much flavour and aroma about the whole thing. The public approved, and applauded.

The end of the third season saw the Choir engaged to sing at an Exhibition, and there a huge audience at once received it with favour:

> The spirit, chained up heretofore through technical disabilities, peeped forth that night. . . . We began to dream dreams. . . . We were now a successful choir, and about to experience one of the concomitants of success—trouble.

Which brings us to Chapter III.—'Taking up House.'

All this time the Choir had been a mere adjunct of an older body—the Toynbee Men's Social Club:

> We were only lodgers. . . . The Club was the father, the Choir the daughter. And the father . . . wanted the last word in the direction of her affairs; and she, being by that time the principal breadwinner, and respectably married forbye, naturally rebelled. . . . And so it happened that one wet night in January, 1906, rather than break the furniture, we left. . . . We were seventy-two strong as we stood, homeless, on the cold pavement in Rottenrow.

Happily shelter was forthcoming in the shape of Collins's Institute, by grace of Messrs. William Collins, Sons & Co. There the Choir found not only a local habitation, but a name. Hitherto it had been the Toynbee House Choir. Its first step on taking up its new quarters was to re-name itself the Glasgow Orpheus Choir, under which name it has now been steadily growing in fame for twenty years.

THE PRESENT CHOIR

The present strength of the Choir is a hundred and thirty-nine. The question of proportion is always of interest, if only for the reason that it necessarily varies with almost every choir. Here are the Orpheus figures, taken from the current issue of the choir organ, The Lute: Trebles 40, Altos 33, Tenors 31, Basses 35. From this same source I take also particulars of the attendance at rehearsals. For the season just ended the average for the whole Choir is 95·2 per cent. as against 94·5 per cent. last season. The four sections have the following records (last season's figures are given in brackets):

Sopranos	...	96·6 per cent.	(95·9 per cent.).
Contraltos	...	93·6 ,,	(93·7 ,,).
Tenors	...	95·5 ,,	(94·0 ,,).
Basses	...	95·0 ,,	(94·7 ,,).

Think of that, easy-going choralists who regard yourselves as slaves to duty if you put in 75 per cent of attendances!

Moreover, sixty-five of these Orpheans have not missed a rehearsal during the season, and twenty-two have been absent only once. It would be interesting to know if any other choral society of the size can show so remarkable a register. Here surely is one of the secrets of the Orpheans' unity and responsiveness to every demand of their conductor.

And the demands of the Orpheus do not stop at a weekly rehearsal and a concert at each term end, as is the case with most choral societies. The Orpheus gives over forty concerts each season! Many of these involve a lengthy journey, and naturally only a section of the Choir is called on. The concerts take place as far afield as London, Inverness, and Ireland. This part of the Choir's activities, however, belongs to the missionary side, which will be touched on later in this article. Here our concern is rather with the present constitution of the Choir, and the means taken to maintain its standard.

First, it is worth noting that there is a yearly examination of members. This ought to be one of the first rules of every choral society that aspires to be something more than a pleasant social organization. After all, some such examination has to take place sooner or later, if the choir is not to be swamped by 'has beens' and other passengers. The simplest and least offensive way (if I may put it so) is to make the examination a part of each season's routine.

But an Orphean has to work hard, not only to retain membership, but to secure it. There is now a probationers' class which meets weekly for sight-singing and voice-training; the instructors are professionally engaged, and are teachers who specialise in the subjects.

At this point a reader says, 'Well, if the Glasgow Orpheus, with all these advantages, doesn't sing as few other choirs sing, it ought to be ashamed of itself!' But has the reader forgotten that the Choir began with thirty raw recruits singing 'We rock away on the billows gay' at the top of their unmusical voices? In other words, its start was pretty much like that of hundreds of other choirs all over the country. It has now arrived at the stage of a waiting list, preliminary classes for probationers, and a ruthless annual weeding out, because from the start it had ambition and a policy, and it sought to achieve these by the only way possible—downright hard work. There has been no playing at choralism; the grounding has been on the lines that produce good orchestras—that is, ample, well-attended practices by enthusiasts who are also good readers, with technical command of their instruments. In regard to the last point, it is worth noting that practically all the solo work at its multitude of concerts is undertaken by members. And not vocal solos only: if a group of pianoforte pieces are needed, these also can be provided from the ranks. That the members include a few first-rate accompanists goes without saying.

THE YOUNG IDEA

The long view of the Choir is shown not only in its probationers' classes but also in the Junior Orpheus. This body comprises a choir, and a section (called the 'Sangspiel') for folk-dancing, action-songs, &c. Here, as in the Choir proper, there is also a sight-singing class for probationers. One almost expects to hear of some preliminary work amongst babes in arms, or that ambitious parents put down their infants' names for the Orpheus as cricketing families in England do for M.C.C. membership!

These Orpheus youngsters deserve a paragraph all to themselves. Their section was formed a little over a year ago, and now numbers a hundred and ten. They made their first entry into the competitive arena in 1924, when they sang in five classes, and carried off four first prizes. I well remember hearing them sing in one of the contests; their performance was a revelation of what can be done with children's choirs. Like their seniors, they have now entered the concert field, and their appeal to the public is shown by the fact that at their concert given at St. Andrew's Hall recently every seat was sold weeks before the event, and hundreds of applicants had to be refused. (St. Andrew's Hall seats nearly three thousand.) What did they sing? A Handel air and other unison songs, and two- and three-part pieces—Frank Bridge's 'Pan's Holiday,' Gerrard Williams's 'Arise, fair maid,' and 'Early one morning,' Delius's 'The Streamlet's Slumber Song,' Holst's 'Song of Fairies,' Charles Wood's 'I have twelve oxen,' Rathbone's 'The Birds,' Walford Davies's 'Humpty-Dumpty,' A. W. Robertson's 'Jenny Wren,' Edward German's 'Shepherds' Dance,' Dyson's 'Fairy Song,' and Watt's 'Curfew.' There were also action-songs, shanties, &c.

BALLOTING FOR TICKETS

The Junior concert has 'caught on' to such an extent that tickets will soon have to be balloted for, as is the case with the senior concerts. For some years past the Orpheus has been able to fill St. Andrew's Hall without advertising, and of late the demand for tickets has so exceeded the supply that a ballot has become the rule. Tickets for the recent London concerts had to be doled out in the same way. In these days of jeremiads on the dwindling of the concert public, such a fact as this smacks of the sensational.

PAYING THE PIPER

With its huge Glasgow public eager to eat out of its hand, and ready to pay for doing so, the Orpheus is spared the financial worries that are a part of most choirs' experience. There is no entrance fee or subscription, and the members do not even pay for their music; moreover, their travelling expenses to the numerous concerts are paid out of the Choir funds. There has never been an appeal for public support, and only once have the members been called on. That occasion was twenty years ago, when the male members were asked for a shilling each—which was duly repaid at the end of the year. The explanation is that the public, knowing it will receive value for money, pays the piper—the only sound basis, and more to be desired than subsidies and grants, whether from State or millionaires.

MISSIONARY WORK

But the Orpheus is not merely solvent: it has a surplus. More; it spends royally. And this brings us to a side of the Choir's work that strikes one as being the most notable of all: its activity as a missionary body. Of the forty odd concerts given annually, a good proportion take place in centres where choralism is backward. The Orpheus carries the torch and lights the flame, and with what effect is shown in the number of flourishing choirs that were started through such visits, and by the further fact that of the many competition festivals now held in Scotland the majority owe their inception either to the Orpheus, its conductor, or both.

It is perhaps inevitable that such a Choir should be a kind of training school for conductors. This is a side of its usefulness that quickly strikes one at the Glasgow Competition Festival. Last year, for example, fourteen of the prize-winning conductors were Orpheans or ex-Orpheans; and in the same school graduated the present condutors of the Greenock, Clydebank, and Partick Male-Voice Choirs (three of the leading male-voice choirs in Scotland) and the Glasgow Tramways Choirs, large bodies, male- and mixed-voice. And if, anywhere within reasonable distance of Glasgow, you hear an exceptionally good choir of youngsters, be it from school or co-operative society, the odds are that it is trained by an ex-Orphean. Discussing this point with Mr. Roberton, I asked what happened to choir members when their outside work as trainers interfered with their Orpheus rehearsals. Were they let down lightly in the way of attendance? 'No,' he replied; 'a young conductor who is faced with the problem of finding time for his Orpheus rehearsals is advised to drop the Choir and go out and preach the gospel.'

Those last three words seem to be the best summing up of the Orpheus aims. The gospel of what? Choralism? A good deal more than that. Let us say Music and Fellowship. Its zeal for the first is shown in the undertaking of such enterprises as series of chamber and other concerts. The London and Léner Quartets have each given a solid week of recitals under the auspices of the Choir, and last season a fortnight of chamber music was undertaken, at which all the Beethoven Quartets were played. First-rate pianoforte soloists are engaged for such occasions. This is one of the ways in which the Choir cheerfully risks a part of its cash surplus. Its visits to out of the way centres also absorb a good deal. (One such visit during the past winter was to the Isle of Bute.) And a good deal more will be spent (or at least jeopardised) in a projected London event, on which at present I must not say more than that it will take place, if at all, in 1926, as a kind of prelude to a Canadian and American tour that is now being arranged.

The running of this Choir, with its almost weekly concerts during the season, and its many other activities, is no small matter. Hence it is not surprising to hear that there are three secretaries and two librarians. There is also a council, of which Mr. F. H. Bisset is chairman. I understand that in the government of the choir, 'discord, dire sister,' has never raised her head. The reason for this almost unique state of things lies in a remark made to me by one of the officials: 'No littleness is tolerated. Our guiding rule is, "If we are going to err, let us err on the side of generosity"'—a comprehensive motto that is worth all the tables of ordinary rules which are set forth in print and mostly broken almost as soon as the ink is dry. As to the second plank in the Choir's platform, one has only to attend a rehearsal to be aware of a spirit of brotherhood that for the time being removes all the wide differences of the members—for the Choir, so far from being (as some English people suppose) a collection of Socialists of the vividest red, is made up of folk holding every sort of religious and political creed. It is difficult to discuss the Orpheus as a social and cultural centre without seeming to exaggerate or 'gush.' I am going to quote a passage from President Bisset's contribution to the anniversary programme already drawn upon. After speaking of some musical achievements of the Choir, he says:

> But I count an infinitely greater thing the function of the Choir as a revealing power to its own members. And from an embarrassment of riches, I select two expressions. A member, speaking from a sick-bed from which he never rose, said: 'After I got into the Orpheus it was different. I began to see the inside of things.' Again, a woman member who had left five years before, wrote, after attending a recent Orpheus concert: 'I missed many of the old familiar faces. To you they may be as ships that pass in the night, but to them there can never be darkness again and silence, for they who have passed through the Orpheus have a mysterious undying something within them.' And these are not isolated instances; they are characteristic. So it cannot surprise that many of the troubles commonly regarded as indigenous to choir life find no place here.

Had I read the above a few years ago, before mixing a good deal with Orpheans and ex-Orpheans, and seeing unmistakable manifestations of this 'something,' I should have felt disposed to regard it as mere sentimentalism—a view which a good many readers no doubt hold. But I am now convinced that it is a very real and powerful factor, and to it is mainly due the extraordinary and far-reaching influence of the Orpheus. It is something more subtle and emotional than the team spirit common to all good English choirs. And if we reticent Southrons ever felt it, we shouldn't mention it. We should merely mumble esprit de corps, and hastily begin to talk of something else.

Something of the unabashed feeling disclosed in the quotation above shows itself in the Orpheus programmes. English critics who have complained, not without reason, of the inclusion of some items that are poorish musically, and undeniably sentimental in style, must not forget the temperamental difference between the North and South of the Tweed. Both Scotch and English are among the most emotional—even sentimental—of races. But the English repress it in their best music and its performance; only in their third-rate balladry is it allowed to show itself. The Scots, on the other hand, find in all their music an outlet for feeling. That this is so is shown by the highly emotional character of Scottish folk-song as compared with English. And I have heard Scots (including Mr. Roberton) say that even the best of English choralism strikes them as being cold. Moreover, in regard to the musical quality of the Orpheus programmes, two further points call for mention: (1) As has been shown, much of the Choir's work is of the propaganda type, and without doubt converts are more readily made by a menu containing a leaven of somewhat obvious items than, for example, by one of the impeccable programmes of the London 'Oriana' Choir. (2) One of the aims of the Choir has always been the fostering of the national spirit in music. This policy involves the inclusion in the programmes of a good many arrangements of Scottish songs. Unfortunately this is too often a weak side of the scheme, for it cannot be said that Scotland has yet produced men able to do for her folk-song what Vaughan Williams, Holst, Stanford, Charles Wood, Whittaker, Herbert Hughes, and others, have done for the folk-tunes of England and Ireland.

ORPHEUS; AND HIS LUTE

No matter how admirable the organization of a choir may be, in the long run it stands or falls by its conductor. This being so, all that has been written above is by implication the completest of tributes to Hugh Roberton. Little therefore need be added, the more so as he is now well known in England through his work as an adjudicator. Many gatherings in the South have enjoyed his unique mixture of idealism, hard commonsense, and humour. I do not apologise for calling the humour 'pawky'; the overworked adjective cannot be kept out or bettered. At the Orpheus rehearsal I attended, I noted down some of his richest and ripest dicta, but on referring to them I see that their effect owed much to their appositeness and manner, and not least to their priceless Doric; cold print cannot do them justice. Happily, his booklet on choral training contains a good deal of his wisdom in solution, so readers may sit at his feet, though for full enjoyment H. S. R. must be heard (and even seen) rather than read. That last word serves as a reminder of Roberton's no mean literary gift. Two short plays, 'Kirsteen,' and 'Christ in the Kirk-yaird' (Collins), and brief poetic flights that appear from time to time in the Glasgow press, are the slight but unmistakable evidence of this gift. And in this connection, that racy monthly The Lute at once comes to mind. It has been published since 1912, and until recently was the only organ issued in connection with a choral society. (A year or so ago a London choir, the South London Philharmonic, started a very readable effort of the kind.) The Lute is edited and largely written by Mr. Roberton, and there are a good many English conductors and others who have it sent to them regularly.

Finally, this article is written, not so much to glorify the Orpheus or its conductor as to show how much more than a mere collection of singers a choral society may become. Few choirs had a more humble or unpromising origin than the Orpheus. There are many hundreds of small choirs much further advanced and better equipped than the thirty beginners who, twenty-five years ago, in a Glasgow back street, threw 'We rock away on the billows gay' in slabs at their new (and rather sore) conductor. Why should not most of these choirs become in time as the Orpheus, missionary bodies, and centres not only of fine singing, but also of light and fellowship? True, the Orpheus has a highly-gifted conductor; but the country abounds in conductors hardly less gifted, though in different ways. Nobody can frequent the competition festival arena without meeting men and women in plenty endowed with a natural genius for leadership and choralism. When their choirs give them a chance by turning up at rehearsals with an average of nearly a hundred per cent., and by working enthusiastically from start to finish, they will be able to produce results remarkably like those obtained by Hugh Roberton.

JEAN DE RESZKE AND MARIE BREMA: SOME REMINISCENCES

By Herman Klein

How swiftly time flies! A quarter of a century has slipped away since that great closing decade of Victorian opera in which Jean de Reszke and Marie Brema played their parts; and soon it will be thirty years since we laid to rest at Brompton Cemetery their over-busy impresario, Sir Augustus Harris. E pur si muove. Yet both artists, after quitting the stage, had remained in harness in their studios, one at Nice, the other at Manchester, until they died just recently within a fortnight of each other. And both were first-rate teachers.

In the life of a great singer there are generally a few features of romance. That of Jean de Reszke not only had such features: it was from first to last a big romance! If only one in fifty of the operatic tenors we read about in novels were creations with half the romantic charm and the deep human interest of this very real man, they would tax our credulity and patience much less than they do. But truth was ever stranger than — and superior to — fiction. Some day, therefore, I hope that Jean de Reszke's history will be written. Certain it is that the present writer is not out to attempt anything so ambitious, alike as to scope and magnitude, within the limits of this article.

THE DE RESZKE FAMILY

The de Reszkes were an intensely musical family. Their home at Warsaw in the 'sixties must have echoed to the sounds of vocal practice almost as loudly and constantly as that of the Pattis at New York had done a few years earlier. (Adelina, it is worth noting, made her début as a wonder-child in 1850, the year in which Jean was born.) There were three sons and a daughter, all with good voices, and all but one of them—Victor, the youngest—destined to win great fame on the operatic stage. Josephine, the first to sing under her own name, was much admired at the Paris Opéra in the late 'seventies, and when I heard her on her first appearance at Covent Garden, in 1881, she struck me as being a fine dramatic soprano; but she soon married, and retired. Edouard, who had followed closely upon his sister at Paris, preceded her here by a season, and even then it was a sheer delight to listen to his rich basso cantante in rôles such as St. Bris, Basilio, Il Conte Almaviva, Walter in 'Guglielmo Tell,' Alvise in 'La Gioconda,' and, later on, Mephistopheles in 'Faust.'

Meanwhile, what of Jean? His voice, after it had 'broken,' came back at a rather early age, and he was only fifteen when he began to study at the Warsaw Conservatoire under Ciaffei, a former operatic tenor. Here the initial error occurred. Jean's low notes were the first to develop, and being of unwonted strength, as is often the case when the growth of the man's voice is slightly premature, Ciaffei arrived at the conclusion that his pupil was a baritone. There was no one to contradict him, so as a baritone the youth was duly trained, and in baritone parts he sang with varying success for the first few years of his stage career. By the advice of Cotogni, with whom he studied for a short time in Italy, he obtained an engagement with Mr. Mapleson, and in April, 1874, made his début at Drury Lane as 'Signor de Reschi,' with Her Majesty's Opera Company. It was in the following season that I first heard him sing as Valentine in 'Faust,' with Capoul in the title-rôle, Rota as Mephistopheles, Trebelli as Siebel, and Christine Nilsson as Marguerite.

Years afterwards I was to tell Jean de Reszke, to his infinite amusement, that of all the members of that notable cast the Valentine alone had left me cold and unimpressed. 'Quite right, too,' was his retort, 'only see what an ample revenge I took afterwards when I became the Faust, and killed off all the Valentines who reminded me of myself!'—for, after a while, as his voice went on developing and the high notes grew rounder and easier, he ceased to believe that he was really a baritone. Then, somewhere about 1882, he met Sbriglia, the teacher, at Paris, and decided to leave the theatre for a time in order to acquire the method of that professed believer in the value of 'nasal resonance'—for Sbriglia was of the same opinion as Jean himself; and, as the latter told me the story, there was an understanding between them that the experiment should be carried out purely on its merits. In other words, there was no question of converting a baritone into a tenor, or otherwise forcing the voice beyond its natural limits (Jean could sing a good A natural or even a B flat before he went to Sbriglia), but simply to adjust the vocal apparatus to what seemed to be its proper tessitura, and decide after a sufficiently prolonged test whether the organ would remain equal to the strain.

JEAN DE RESZKE A TRUE TENOR

In the opinion of those well qualified to judge, the experiment proved a complete success. Massenet was among the first to pronounce the newly-placed voice a genuine tenor. He wrote his opera 'Le Cid' with Jean de Reszke in view, and designated him for the principal part when it was produced at Paris in November, 1885. The success of the Polish singer was quickly established, and in another twelvemonth he was the enfant gâté of the Opéra abonnés.

It was this that attracted the attention of Augustus Harris when he was hatching the scheme for his preliminary season of Italian opera at Drury Lane. He asked me for my opinion, and I unhesitatingly advised him to depend upon the Polish brothers rather than upon any prima donna then available, as the nucleus of a new constellation. The opening night, June 13, 1887, was one of the most brilliant ever witnessed in this metropolis. It settled the fate of the whole enterprise, as well as that of Jean de Reszke, who instantly became an artist of world-wide fame. Also, incidentally, it was followed by a loss of £10,000 on the season, but the rescue of 'grand opera' from a moribund condition in this country.'

So completely was the modest young 'baritone' of the Mapleson days forgotten, that I can scarcely recall a comparison of any sort being made between him and the splendid fully-fledged tenor who now came into the picture. The fact was mentioned, no more. I wrote myself that

> This truly great artist once sang as a baritone, but his voice is now unmistakably a tenore robusto. His high notes, produced with ease, and always in perfect tune, are of magnificent quality and resonant as a bell. He sings without a suspicion of the tremolo, uses the mezza-voce with moderation, declaims with splendid vigour, and phrases with a purity and nobility of expression that never fail to impress.*

This was with reference to his Radamès. Later in the season I also described him in turn as 'an ideal Lohengrin,' 'an unsurpassable Faust,' and 'a superb Raoul'—epithets that were to cling to those impersonations so long as he appeared in them. Afterwards came the long series of wonderful seasons at Covent Garden, about which Lord Wittenham wrote so eloquently in The Times of April 6. (He was originally Mr. G. Denison Faber, the lessor of the opera house, and a great admirer of the de Reszkes.) This otherwise charming appreciation of the lamented singer was to my thinking entirely spoilt by the following paragraph:

> As regards his wondrous singing, one must never forget, as he never forgot, that he was a forced-up baritone; that he was not really comfortable on the top tenor register; that only his marvellous art of singing enabled him to do what he did with all his tenor parts. . . . He was not a truly dramatic tenor, for the reason I have given, though he sang so many dramatic parts. I felt this first one night at Covent Garden, long ago, while he was singing a great passage as Raoul in 'The Huguenots,' when his voice broke.

Now there are some statements here that require proof. The matters of opinion may go for what they are worth, but I for one cannot accept without better evidence Lord Wittenham's assertion that Jean de Reszke 'never forgot he was a forced-up baritone.' What I would like to know is when he declared or admitted that he was such. He never did so in my presence, and I was his intimate friend as well as his severest critic during the whole thirteen years that his voice withstood a strain which no baritone on this earth could have borne for six months. No art, however marvellous, could have worked that miracle in parts like Tristan and Siegfried, or even Walther von Stolzing, with the 'Preislied' awaiting him at the very end. Was it then that Jean de Reszke was not 'really comfortable'? If so, I never noticed it. And on what date, I should like to know, did his voice actually 'break' in 'The Huguenots'? The catastrophe was never reported on the Rialto.

THE EVIDENCE

Truth to tell, there are always sapient folk ready to discuss great tenors, to compare their voices, and (unless they be born Italians like Mario and Giuglini, or Tamagno and Caruso) to cast doubts upon their 'genuineness.' I have listened again and again to this kind of thing with reference to Sims Reeves and Edward Lloyd—especially Lloyd, whom some people would have was a counter-tenor, and not a true tenor at all. To me it matters little what a voice be called so long as it is beautiful, beautifully used, and equal to the task that beautiful music imposes upon it. 'A rose by any other name,' &c. But as regards Jean de Reszke, I contend that the unalloyed perfection of his method (apart, I mean, from his amazing breath-control or his impeccable phrasing), the exquisite and unforced timbre of his voice, the ease of his sostenuto—these were things that no singer could have accomplished and maintained for year after year if working upon an artificial tension of the vocal cords.

I once questioned his New York doctor, Holbrook Curtis, on this very point. His answer was conclusive: 'Jean's vocal cords are perfectly strong and healthy. There is nothing the matter with his throat; his trouble, when he has any, is much more of a bronchial nature. The vocal cords do not show the slightest evidence of strain.' This was at a period when he was visiting America for four or five months in every year (1890 to 1898), singing heavy rôles two and three times a week in a climate that certainly suited him better than ours. But even in London I can only remember his complaining once that he was being worked too hard—it was, I fancy, in 1896—when he objected to singing Roméo only two nights after he had sung Tristan. 'They must give me long enough,' he said, 'to recover my mezza-voce.'

* 'Musical Notes' for 1887. London: Novello.

THE ARTIST AND THE MAN

Looking back upon the wonderful career of this gifted singer, one cannot fail to be struck by the steady and increasing artistic growth to which it bears witness. At first he was bound by the traditions and conventions of the Italian school in which he had been trained. He confessed that he hated having to sing Lohengrin in Italian, and would much prefer, if possible, to sing Meyerbeer and Gounod in French. The chance did not come until 1889, when Sir Augustus Harris mounted 'Roméo et Juliette' for him and Edouard and Melba. It was the outcome of the brothers' triumph in the November of the previous year, when Adelina Patti appeared with them in Gounod's work at the Paris Opéra, the composer conducting. I saw both performances, and to me they brought the revelation of a new Jean de Reszke. Here I agree with Lord Wittenham: 'As Roméo he broke one's heart with his acting and singing. Who can forget his "Non, ce n'est pas le jour"?' Who, indeed!

From that time he went forward to higher things. He studied and analysed his parts more deeply than before. His success as Walther in 'Die Meistersinger' (in the hated Italian) fired his ambition to master Wagner in German. It took time, but he did it. His first season in the States encouraged him immensely, and he worked harder than ever. He wrote me from Chicago in December, 1891:

> I send you cuttings so that you may know how successful your friends are in America. I have sung here 'Lohengrin' (2), 'Faust' (2), 'Huguenots' (2), 'Roméo' (1), and 'Otello' (2), with 'Lohengrin' once at Louisville. That makes ten representations in a month!

He could scarcely improve as a singer, but as an actor he certainly went on doing so; and the climax that was to reveal his genius in fullest splendour came with the proud moments when he first sang Tristan and Siegfried in London in 1896.

Two years later he wrote to me that his artistic yearnings were satisfied, and also that he had had enough of work in America. In 1900 he sang at Covent Garden for the last time. Of his labours as a teacher at Paris and at Nice I can only say that his pupils were all intensely devoted to him, that their stage training bore the cachet of his supreme talent in a greater degree than their vocal equipment, which perforce had to be left too much to the attention of his assistants. But alike as artist and friend, he was one of the most lovable men I have ever known.

MARIE BREMA

A woman of unusual intelligence, energy, versatility, and industry, a thorough musician, and endowed with rare artistic feeling and perception, Marie Brema was a shining example of what an accomplished amateur can rise to with the will to learn and to succeed. I had heard of her at Liverpool and in the North of England long before she came out as a professional singer in London; but I cannot remember actually hearing her until her operatic début at the Shaftesbury Theatre on October 19, 1891, when she sang the small part of Lola in the first performance of 'Cavalleria Rusticana' given in this country. Her voice escaped notice on that interesting occasion. The Sunday Times described her as 'attractive,' the Musical Times as 'tactful.' About her singing, not a word.

I see that 'Grove' states that she made her first appearance in London at the Popular Concerts on February 21 of the same year, but can find no account of the incident. It was a Saturday, and I attended the Crystal Palace concert, at which, by the way, Lady Hallé was too ill to play, and Miss Ilona Eibenschütz (now Mrs. Carl Derenberg) appeared as soloist in her stead. My 'cuttings' show that the singer at the 'Pop.' was Mr. Braxton Smith; and further search reveals that the name of Miss Marie Bremer (as she then spelt it) was first mentioned by me as the 'delightfully acceptable vocalist' at a recital given at St. James's Hall on May 6, 1891, by Jean Gérardy, assisted by M. Ysaÿe and Herr Benno Schönberger. Perhaps Sir George Henschel could explain this.

But her first two or three years before the London public were years of promise rather than realisation. Whilst singing at concerts, and even at a Festival (Birmingham, 1894), she continued working hard with a stage career in mind. The outcome of this was made manifest by the immediate successes that she won at Bayreuth and in America. Madame Wagner justly admired her fine mezzo-soprano voice, her tall, statuesque figure, her noble carriage; she allowed her to sing such parts as Ortrud and Kundry, and the result vindicated her choice. Marie Brema appeared at New York in 1894-95 with Walter Damrosch, making a hit as Ortrud and Brangäne, singing other parts in Italian, German, and French, accumulating a rich experience that was to qualify her for the high position she won as an 'international' artist.

On her return to Europe one noted a great advance in her art. She demonstrated it at Covent Garden, and again at Bayreuth; then at Brussels and Paris, where her Amneris, her Dalila, and her Orféo set the seal upon her Continental fame. The London triumphs of this talented Englishwoman, when she was measuring her gifts side by side with the greatest exponents of her art, culminated, I think, in a superb impersonation of Brangäne during the season of 1898. This was on the June night when 'Tristan und Isolde' was given for the début of that glorious artist Milka Ternina as Isolde, with Jean de Reszke as Tristan and Anton van Rooy as Kurwenal—a cast that has not been matched since. The beauty of Marie Brema's tone on the long, sustained high notes of Brangäne's warning to the lovers was something to be remembered.

It was always a pleasure to hear in oratorio a singer so dramatic, yet so refined and intellectual as Marie Brema; but after all she was in her true element on the stage, where, as a natural actress full of passionate fire, she always shone to most advantage. Thus her admirable revival of Gluck's 'Orpheus' at the Savoy Theatre in 1910 afforded to a new generation a welcome demonstration of the many-sided beauties of her art, revealing alike classic dignity, grace, and prescience in every detail. It was, in a word, characteristic of the woman herself.

After her retirement from active work as a singer she resided and taught at Manchester, where her classes of course were always full. I was fortunate enough to meet her again, after a long interval, only a few months ago, bright, cheery, smiling, interested as ever, and obviously glad to shake hands once more with a very old friend.

Ad Libitum

By 'FESTE'

The children's concert is now well established in this country, and is one of the most beneficent and practical features of our musical life. Some of us may hold the view that an undue amount of importance is attached to things that don't matter overmuch, such as the shape and size of instruments, or the ability to spot the second subject at its recapitulation. But there can be no doubt that, in a general way, the movement is pursued on lines which are attractive—a prime consideration—and which make no undue concessions in the matter of quality or taste. The attraction is entirely musical. We have not yet found it necessary to use low comedy as a bait. We cannot imagine (say) Dr. Malcolm Sargent telling his audience of youngsters that George Robey was about to visit the concert-hall and give them a violin solo; the announcement being followed by the arrival of the comedian, eloquent eyebrows and all, who (after requesting his audience to 'Desist!') would proceed to take his part in a concerto, finally revealing himself as a member of the orchestra disguised. Yet this kind of thing happened at Philadelphia recently. Before me lies a cutting from the North American headed:

STOKOWSKI SHOWS CHAPLIN TO CHILDREN

IMITATOR OF FILM STAR AMUSES AUDIENCE AT ACADEMY

ARDENT FANS FOOLED

The article opens:

> It was a wonderful occasion for the children at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. 'Last night,' began Mr. Stokowski, 'I heard a very loud auto-horn, and, looking out of my window, saw a beautiful, big Rolls-Royce draw up; and who do you think had come?' 'Charlie Chaplin,' answered all the children, who had thought of nothing else since the last children's concert, when Mr. Stokowski promised Charlie would play for the children this time.

The suspense was kept up by Mr. Stokowski telling the children that he didn't know where Charlie was staying, but it was hoped that he would be able to turn up in time to play. In preparation for his arrival the audience practised 'Charlie is my darling,' and the further period of waiting was filled in by a performance of a Mozart Overture and the 'Unfinished' Symphony, 'which,' said Mr. Stokowski, 'is the most beautiful Symphony in the world, and some of you have heard it in jazz form.' [Poor Schubert!]

> And then, just when every one was beginning to despair of Charlie's arrival, there was a loud honking, considerable off-stage noise and excitement, and a positive announcement that 'Mr. Chaplin has arrived.' Naturally, every one was thrilled, and they even brought out the beautiful red carpet that is specially reserved for soloists. Charlie was evidently in great haste, for he tripped over the red carpet, but managed to turn the fall into a beautiful somersault, landing exactly next to Mr. Stokowski's stand, where he carefully readjusted his derby hat and cane, and brushed his elongated shoes with a special whiskbroom. Then there were further difficulties while Charlie tried various 'cellos before he found just the right instrument. Whatever doubt there was as to 'Charlie's' identity, there was certainly none as to his being a real 'cellist; for he played very beautifully, and was able to make the funniest faces while he played the saddest music. Even after the little guests had found out it wasn't actually 'Charlie himself,' they admitted the substitute was near enough the real thing to have fooled the most ardent Chaplin fan.

Well, this old country may be a bit backward in some respects, but if the Philadelphian method of training the audience of the future is supposed to be 'progress,' let us hope she will always keep her place well behind the leaders. Incidentally, the episode explains a paragraph that recently went the round of the press, to the effect that Charlie Chaplin had appeared as a violoncello soloist at a Philadelphia symphony concert. 'It is not generally known [said the paragraphist] that the famous film artist is also an accomplished musician.' No; it isn't generally known. The extreme slenderness of Mr. Chaplin's musical 'accomplishments' was shown in these columns during his visit to England a few years ago.

In the Sunday Times of April 12, Mr. Newman had some interesting things to say (in an interview) on the state of music in America. He tells us that the American public is immensely interested in public music-making, and throngs both concert-room and opera-house in a way that is unknown on this side of the water. But is it not a fact that, so far as the concert audience is concerned, the interest is rather in the performer than in the music? For example, I have read somewhere that the main feature in the announcement of an orchestral concert is the name of the conductor: the programme is quite a secondary consideration. This is only another form of prima donnaism; it is not unknown in this country, but we can at least claim that the public attendance is influenced far more by the choice of music than by the name of the conductor. A further sign of a curious lack of sense of values is shown in the American musical press. Here is an example: the front page of one of the most important of these journals contains a large portrait of Mr. Charles Wakefield Cadman, caught in the act of composition. Beneath is the following:

> A new song from so eminent and popular a composer as Charles Wakefield Cadman is always an event of national interest and importance. It is an event of especial interest when the work is of a kind that will be sure to attract not only the musically trained and gifted, but also the ignorant and numerous mass of music-lovers as well. The reason that Cadman is really great is because he has been able to attract the masses as well as the classes. The publication by Harms of his new song, 'My Desire,' is an event equal to the publication of his 'At dawning,' 'I hear a thrush at eve,' or 'The land of the sky-blue water.' It is that kind of a song and will have that kind of success.

On another page of the journal is a facsimile of the opening page of 'My Desire.' It is the merest 'shop' balladry, as will be seen from this sample:

Now, we have plenty of the 'My Desire' type of composer in England—in fact, if America wants a few more, we can spare her a cargo. Every European country is well supplied, but I know of no prominent musical journal in England, France, Germany, or Italy, that would give up its front page to a portrait of one of its Cadmans, call him 'really great,' and solemnly announce that a new song from his pen was 'always an event of national interest and importance.'

We have a better sense of values than that, and we reserve such expressions as 'great' and 'national importance' for something more momentous than best sellers. I do not write this without some knowledge of Mr. Cadman's work. I have a good deal of his pianoforte music, and some of his songs, and without wishing to be offensive I must say that over here his place would not be among the 'really great,' but among the large number of successful writers of shop ballads. There is room for such composers in the scheme of things, but their place is quite undistinguished, lucrative though it be. Americans must not complain of our disinclination to take their country seriously where music is concerned, so long as anomalies of this kind are common features of her musical journals—which presumably represent the average musical outlook. And if a reader points out that this 'featuring' of 'My Desire' and its composer is merely a matter of publicity, bought and paid for, I can only reply that the explanation makes the matter worse.

Judging from some recent experience at pianoforte recitals, the time is ripe for overhauling our ideas of tempo and rhythm, and, above all, of tempo rubato, especially so far as it concerns the performance of Chopin. Many eminent recitalists have reached a stage when their studied avoidance of anything like the time and rhythm indicated by composers has become an irritating convention—and one, moreover, that is being copied by the small fry in the domestic circle with devastating results.

When I saw that Miss Mània Seguel was to give a Chopin recital at which she would follow the rubato rule of keeping the left hand in strict time, while the right fluctuated in pace, I made a point of turning up.

Miss Seguel's programme led off with this quotation from Henry T. Finck's 'Success in Music':

> Rubato means robbed, and it would almost seem as if most of the historians, biographers, and lexicographers, in writing about Chopin's Tempo rubato, had been temporarily robbed of their wits. They are impressed, puzzled, paralysed, convinced by the testimony of his pupils that he used to say to them that however much the singing hand might fluctuate in pace, the accompanying hand must play strictly in time.

On reading the quotation, my first impression was that the recitalist wished to show us, on the authority of Mr. Finck, and by her playing, that the dictum ascribed to Chopin was absurd. A note, however, went on to say that she would 'follow the rule in all those pieces which lent themselves to the treatment.'.

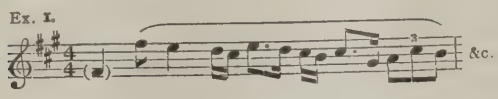
I have never been convinced that Chopin laid down this rule. Wouldn't it often lead to the harmonic implications of the right hand running counter to those expressed by the left? I cannot say that Miss Seguel's performance shed any light on the question; it seemed to be just ordinary, rather insensitive playing. She began with the Nocturne in F sharp minor, and delivered the main theme in a distorted rhythmic shape that became more mechanical with each repetition. As nearly as I could note it down, the tune came out like this:

Ex. 1.



For the life of me, I cannot see that this is an improvement on Chopin's version. In fact, without putting in a plea for rigidly strict time in music of this sort, I believe that an exact performance as Chopin wrote it: is more expressive and poetic, and even more free, than the rubato form in Ex. 1. I could not stay for the whole of the programme, but I remained long enough to be convinced that Miss Seguel's ad libitum treatment of Chopin's melodic line was decidedly more stiff in effect than a faithful following of the copy would have been.

I have since looked up this matter in an excellent little book by Jean Kleczynski (translated by Alfred Whittingham, and published by William Reeves), 'How to Play Chopin.' The author bases his conclusions partly on information obtained from pupils and friends of Chopin, and we may therefore regard him as an authority. He has a good deal to say about rubato. After showing that, so far from being an invention of Chopin's, its origin may be seen in some florid passages of plain-song, he says:

> Some of Chopin's pupils have assured me that in the rubato the left hand ought to keep perfect time, while the right indulges its fancy; and that in such a case Chopin would say, 'The left hand is the conductor of the orchestra.' Many passages of the Berceuse can be executed in this manner. Paganini also, playing with the orchestra, recommended that the instrumentalists should observe the time, whilst he himself departed from it, and then again returned to it. It is, nevertheless, my belief that this means can be employed only in certain particular cases; and I therefore can only regard it as a demi-rubato.

He had previously quoted Liszt's well-known definition of Chopin's rubato:

> Suppose a tree bent by the wind; between the leaves pass the rays of the sun, a trembling light is the result, and this is the rubato.

Somebody else has likened it to the waving branches of a tree, represented by the right hand, the left hand being the stable trunk.

On this Kleczynski says:

> There are passages in the works of Chopin, in which not only do the leaves tremble (to continue the comparison of Liszt), but the trunk totters. For instance, the Polonaise in C sharp (Op. 26), third part, measures 9-14; Nocturne in A flat (Op. 32), the middle part. We may quote also the Impromptu in A flat; here everything totters from foundation to summit, and everything is, nevertheless, so beautiful and so clear.

Evidently there is no place in Chopin as a whole for strict time in one hand and free in the other. In fact, the more one goes into the matter, the more certain it seems that the 'rule' ascribed to Chopin himself is applicable only in brief sections where the right hand executes a decorative passage over a left-hand figure; or in such a piece as the Berceuse, which is an extended example of the same thing, and wherein the monotonous regularity of the rocking left-hand figure has significance.

Such evidence as is forthcoming seems to show that Chopin's freedom of tempo never degenerated into the eccentricity of the more enthusiastic rubatoists. Moscheles tells us that 'Chopin's manner of playing ad libitum, a phrase which to many signifies deficiency in time and rhythm, was with him only a charming originality of execution."

> We see, therefore [adds Kleczynski], that even the rubato is never a defect in the time; the idea of rhythm, and consequently the relative value of the notes, must never be lost, apparent changes and momentary incongruities notwithstanding.

I have italicised the words that seem to contain the whole matter in a nutshell. The trouble with most of the ad libitum playing of to-day is that it destroys this relative value of the notes, and with it the rhythm. Kleczynski goes into the question at too great length for further quotation here. I can only say that he shows rubato to be merely the application of the ordinary laws of good and sensitive phrasing. It is not, as many people suppose, something that belongs almost exclusively to Chopin's works, though naturally there is greater scope for it in his music, with its highly-organized melodic line, than in (say) polyphonic writing, or in works of a straightforward rhythmic character. Yet lots of eminent pianists turn it on indiscriminately. I recently heard, on a player-piano, performances by a dozen of the most famous pianists of to-day, and could hardly sit through some Bach and Beethoven pieces in which scarcely a bar was without a hold-up. It was maddening to feel that the culprits were beyond reach of an injunction to 'Get on with it.' By the way, Kleczynski puts forward as an explanation of the non-success of Chopin's E minor Concerto, the view that 'rubato is applicable only to somewhat short movements; applied to longer compositions it might become monotonous.' Be that as it may, the remark is a useful reminder that excessive freedom can become as uninteresting as too much regularity; moreover, of the two faults, it is the less likely to give us the composer's message, especially in the case of the early classics.

Save us from our friends! Woman as a composer has had something less than justice done her, perhaps, but the severest crusher comes from the Radio Times, in an article on 'Women's Work in Music.' After pointing out that 'it is rather remarkable that there has been no woman Beethoven, no woman Schubert, and no woman Mozart,' the writer proceeds:

> Since woman has become 'emancipated,' however, she has shown that in the realm of music, as in other spheres, she can perform wonders.

Unfortunately, particulars of these 'wonders' are not given. The bulk of the article consists of a natural tribute to Dame Ethel Smyth, after which we descend abruptly to Carrie Jacobs-Bond, the composer of 'A Perfect Day,' who deserves to be called the woman Schubert on one score at all events: 'she has written several hundred songs.' Moreover, a further tribute to women's work in music is evidently supposed to lie in the fact, solemnly set forth, that 'the most famous song in the world, "Home, sweet home," was written by a third cousin of the composer of "A Perfect Day."' It is a pity he didn't happen to be a woman as well.

The final paragraph of this damning indictment of the woman composer must be quoted in full:

> Space forbids mention of even a fraction of the compositions by women that are known all over the world. One only needs to remember 'Because,' by Guy d'Hardelot; the 'Indian Love Lyrics,' by Amy Woodforde-Finden; 'Violets,' by Ellen Wright; 'Two Eyes of Grey,' by Daisy McGeogh, and many of the works of Liza Lehmann to realise that women can more than hold their own with men as composers of the first rank.

Turn that over in your mind for a bit! 'Because,' 'Two Eyes of Grey,' and the rest are proofs that 'women can more than hold their own with [i.e., they are superior to] men as composers of the first rank.' Make a short list of 'men composers of the first rank' and set them beside Guy, Daisy, &c. . . . Yet we were told above that there has been 'no woman Beethoven, Schubert, or Mozart.' However, perhaps the balance is made right by the fact that there are enough and to spare of men Carrie Jacobs-Bonds and Guy d'Hardelots.

The Radio Times really ought to appoint somebody to overlook its articles on music. The biographies that appear from time to time generally lay emphasis on the pictorial and sentimental things that don't matter, and the articles in which well-known singers discuss their favourite songs are usually feeble in matter and manner. Yet the writers have good models before them in Mr. Scholes's simple, straightforward notes on the chief items in the concert programmes. With its enormous public, the Radio Times ought to be a valuable means of providing really good musical journalism to thousands who never read about the art elsewhere.

One or two readers point out a slip in my note on the musical examples quoted from Tcherepnin's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte (see p. 325, April issue). In speaking of Ex. 2, I wrote 'F natural and G flat' instead of 'D natural and E flat.' I have parted with the copy, so I cannot be sure whether I misread the clefs, or whether the printer made them treble instead of bass. Fortunately the music is of the accommodating kind wherein such details matter little. Any old clef will do.

THE MUSIC CRITIC

By Basil Maine

It is greatly to be feared that Mr. Ernest Newman's articles on the sorrows of the music critic, which have lately appeared in the Sunday Times, will lead the laity of the musical world to generalise too freely as to the nature and attitude of the other members of his calling. It is the more to be feared in that Mr. Newman's words are widely broadcast in the land, and that they carry the weight of his full experience and are pointed by his rare mentality. These articles, which were prompted by various sage remarks, gathered from some of Dr. Percy Buck's lectures, are in effect a confession of faith; even more literally, they are a confession of illusion. Mr. Newman, after devoting many years to the analysis and performance of music, finds himself impelled to declare roundly:

> At a liberal estimate, I should say that the proportion of perfect to fairly good performances is, in the case of short solo works, one in a hundred, in the case of long orchestral works, one in a thousand, and in the case of operas that involve the co-operation of so many and such different factors, one in fifty thousand. Is it any wonder then that nothing seems to the man in the street to please the critic? In the nature of the case very little can please him entirely.

Now, this to me is an astounding statement. I would not go so far as to dispute the actual figures. With regard to the fifty thousand operatic performances, I can only say I was not there. But it is the implication that is so startling, for Mr. Newman leads us to assume that there was a time when he fondled the illusion that he would meet with perfection at every other turn, or, let us say (to answer by the method), at one turn in ten in the case of short solo works, at one in a hundred in the case of long orchestral works, and of one in five thousand in the case of operas. Yet, knowing his austerity of judgment and the salted touch of cynicism which he brings to its expression, it is difficult to believe that he entertained so naïve a hope at any time. He was never the man to expect the impossible; you cannot imagine him running feverishly to the Albert Hall because a concert-agent with an eye for business has suddenly cried out, 'Lo, there!' He is too shrewd to hope for anything beyond an average attainment, and more often than not he has been proved in the right. Then why this continued pursuit after Perfect Perfection? Why this bitterness because it is nowhere to be found? It is the very essence of all criticism that it must be infused with idealism —an idealism so jealously high that no outstretched mortal hand can touch it. But—and this is important—the idealism or 'perfection' in the critic's mind must not be wholly revealed at any given moment, lest those who are criticised be stricken with despair. There must be wisdom in the application—wisdom, and a touch of human kindness. This is not to admit that we must suffer fools gladly. Suffer them we must—and nobody is called upon to suffer more of them than the music critic—but we need not simulate gladness.

Musical criticism has experienced a great change during the last ten years or so, and the time will soon arrive when the fools will look in vain for a tactful 'notice' of their folly; there will be no question of libel; they will be quietly ignored. That method has already been adopted in some of the daily papers. But all recital-givers are not fools; let us allow for forty out of a hundred who are not. They must be looked to, and when we, the visiting priests, go to hear their confessions, we must remember that 'Perfection,' like 'Infinity,' is merely a convenient word for something beyond the content of the human mind. Of course it will go ill with us if we let it be known that 'Perfection' is a thing we have never experienced, and therefore cannot apply as a unit of judgment; we must be Jesuitical, and at all costs maintain 'the shows of things.' Yet every critic knows in his heart—and will Mr. Newman deny it?—that the most he can acquire is a perception so keen that he will be able to recognise the various imperfections at a glance, note the causes, and set them down in comprehensible terms. As for the completely perfect performance, whether of a single song or of an entire opera, there is no absolute standard that we know of whereby it may be recognised and acclaimed.

CAN THE CRITIC ENJOY?

The mind of the music critic, like that of the dramatic critic, must be for ever performing a feat of attention not less astounding than that of the juggler who balances a table on a billiard cue upon his nose, and at the same time twirls a bowl of roses on the forefinger of his right hand. The mental reception of a musical performance for the purpose of judgment implies the simultaneous processes of analysis and co-ordination. This habit of mind necessarily precludes the sensation of pleasure in the ordinary meaning of the term; that is to say, the critic would not be able to enjoy a performance in the same manner and degree as an average audience would enjoy it, for this clear reason, that the audience has come for the purpose of enjoyment, and the critic for the purpose of criticising. On rare occasions the critic finds that his preconceived standard has been satisfied, and the resulting pleasure is immeasurably greater than that of the average member of the audience, who has no standard at all, or none more definite than that connoted by such exclamations as 'Charming!' 'Too lovely!' 'So full of feeling!' and the rest. And here I find myself running parallel to Mr. Newman, who writes at the beginning of his article:

> There is no delight in the world to compare with that of an experienced musician listening to a fine work finely performed.

This is a heartening declaration, and, of course, must be extended to all forms of critical appreciation to be strictly true. But why need Mr. Newman deduce from this that there are no grades in this delight—that the 'experienced musician' is a kind of spoilt child who must never be brought into contact with anything but perfection, lest he stamp and scream with frenzy? Many music critics, after a few years of hard experience, have come at last to be thankful for a little thing; many of them—I do not say that they are in the majority—will remember with infinite pleasure an individual performance of Hugo Wolf's 'Neue Liebe' because of the perfect singing of the one phrase, 'Ein süsses Schrecken geht durch mein Gebein!' or a performance of Verdi's 'Otello,' because the 'Credo' was superbly sung. This does not mean that they have ceased to retain their original standards of judgment; it merely means that they no longer expect those standards to be satisfied. When, perchance, some mortal singer, or violinist, or conductor, rises and touches the seemingly unattainable height, even for the briefest moment, then you will see these wiser and more human critics hurry from the concert-hall to send the glad news to their several journals: 'Be glad with us,' they write, 'for we have heard with our ears what we believed in our hearts.'

Mr. Newman writes to provoke—an excellent reason. There is another paragraph which calls for special protest. Under the heading 'An Instructive Parallel,' he says:

> You would not ask the ordnance surveyor to carry about with him two sets of measurements, one for the man who has had his land for a generation, the other for the man who bought his land yesterday. Is it any more reasonable to expect the musical critic to have two or three different measuring tapes in his pocket?

This again is very enlightening as to Mr. Newman's attitude towards criticism. It reveals that his ideal music critic is the man who eliminates personal feeling entirely, and becomes an automatic dispenser of laws. But this is too easy, and moreover, this view is based upon the false assumption that the laws and canons of music are as immutable as those of the Medes and Persians. It also destroys at one fell swoop the most important element in criticism —the personal element. Every schoolmaster knows that the only true way of education is to meet each special case on its own ground; and to do this he must be constantly adjusting the measuring tape. He knows full well that an examination list which proclaims term after term that A has a ninety-seven per cent. intelligence, and that B's is fifty-four per cent., will ultimately defeat its own end. (He makes no adjustment for the ten per cent. intelligence, for, if he is wise, he knows that either the case is hopeless, or, more likely, the recurring ten indicates that the subject for which this mind has a special aptitude is omitted from the ordinary school curriculum.) But in order to maintain the excellent standard of A, and improve B's very fair attainment, he must never cease to inspire B with sanguine hope and A with wholesome fear. The music critic is constantly called upon to deal with similar cases. A young singer with an unmistakable musical endowment, a good voice, and intelligence, can be either advanced or entirely destroyed at a single recital. And the critic has the power. He can employ one of two methods: either he can stand upon his Olympic height and cry, 'Leap to this place,' knowing what will befall and caring not; or he can descend a little, and tentatively hold out a helping hand. How much he will descend is a question each critic must decide in his own mind; that is part of the exercise of his critical faculty. For the first principle of criticism is the ability to criticise one's self.

The analogy between critic and schoolmaster must not be pressed too far; they are not altogether alike, although they are next of kin. But most emphatically the music critic is not an ordnance surveyor; nor can any relation be established between them within the bounds of legitimacy.

'AT THE BOAR'S HEAD'

By Ernest Newman

It is said that after Stradivari's death his heirs found a large number of fiddle backs and bellies in his workshop, all ready to be made up into Stradivari violins. They put them together in the regulation way, but in no case succeeded in making a first-rate Stradivari. The explanation put forward is that it is not every good fiddle front that will go perfectly with every good fiddle back. To get the ideal instrument there must be a selection of two resonances ideally fitted for each other. Modern science has attempted this in its own way: old Stradivari apparently achieved it in his way—unconsciously, perhaps, by a sort of sixth sense.

I have been reminded of this story by the attempts that have been made to pooh-pooh Gustav Holst's achievement in 'At the Boar's Head.' All he has done, it has been said, is to take sundry passages from Shakespeare and some thirty-five or forty folk-tunes, and pin the tunes to the prose; and as the prose is good and the tunes are good, it is no wonder that something good has resulted from the pinning. It is implied that this sort of thing is so easy to do that there is no credit in doing it. To anyone who thinks like that, I can only say, 'In that case, suppose you try your own hand at it? There is still a good deal of Shakespeare left over: there are hundreds of good old melodies still crying out to be taken modern notice of. Why not do what Holst has done, and, since it is so easy, do it better?' But I fancy that the next person who tries his hand at it will not find it anything like so easy as it looks. For this, as for all simple-looking but really subtle things, one needs a sixth sense.

Holst has told us how the idea of the little opera—or the 'musical interlude,' as he prefers to call it—came to him. During a recent illness he was solacing himself by reading 'Henry IV.,' and at other times by glancing through the melodies in Playford's 'Dancing Master' and various collections of English folk-tunes by Cecil Sharp and others. To his astonishment he found some of Falstaff's chatter racing through his head quite naturally to some of the tunes. Then it occurred to him to run together into a connected whole various episodes from the two Parts of the play—which he has done with considerable skill—and to set virtually the whole text to old melodies. His own chief musical contributions to the score are a recitative for Prince Hal ('I know you all, and will a while uphold The unyoked humour of your idleness'), and a tune for two of the Sonnets, which he puts into the Prince's mouth in the scene in which he and Poins, disguised, wait upon Falstaff and Doll Tearsheet: the tune is afterwards combined contrapuntally with the old 'Chevy Chase' (sung by Falstaff to the words 'When Arthur first in court began'), and the two are worked up into a quintet for Hal, Falstaff, Poins, Doll Tearsheet, and Dame Quickly. Almost the whole of the rest of the score is made up of traditional tunes, not, however, in the form of lyrics in a spoken text, as in 'The Beggar's Opera,' but woven into a continuous vocal and orchestral tissue.

The dramatic pasticcio has been skilfully put together out of the many well-known scenes at the Boar's Head: the ensemble just referred to comes at the right moment to afford contrast to the dialogue that has hitherto prevailed; and later, diversion is given by a military march, the singing of the soldiers ('off') as they go to the wars, and other episodes that give relief and point to the action while at the same time lending themselves to musical treatment. Of the expertness—in its way a kind of inspiration—shown in the choice of the melodies I have already spoken. The tunes are always appropriate to the mood and the words, and sometimes chime so perfectly with them that we can hardly imagine better ones being invented expressly for the purpose. Had an opera composer written, in the ordinary way of business, a snatch so 'just right' in its simple pathos as the little tune that symbolises the genuine affection the Hostess and Doll have for the fat old rascal of a knight, we should be writing paragraphs on the uncanny power of genius to say so much in so few notes. Had Verdi written the music to Falstaff's speech when, for Harry's moral benefit, he impersonates the King, we should all have been saying that only Verdi could have done it; yet the music of these eight pages of the score is a pasticcio of old tunes, the appositeness of which to Shakespeare's juicy text was never suspected till Holst's sixth sense revealed it to us.

After the first performance, at Manchester, on April 3, one or two of my colleagues complained of a certain monotony in the score. Putting the æsthetic question aside for the moment, on the technical side this is really a tribute to Holst's skill: it means that, though working with such haphazard material, he has at any rate made a continuous tissue out of it. Here again the choice of tunes often shows an almost uncanny rightness. Dame Quickly's long tirade against Pistol is musically so much of a piece that the ordinary listener would never suspect that more than one old tune has gone to the making of it; there is a sort of family relationship between them that shows plainly enough in their physiognomy when it is pointed out to us, but that, casually turning over the third and then the tenth volume of Cecil Sharp's 'Country Dance Tunes,' we should not have expected to exist between 'Maiden Lane' and 'Pepper's Black.' The military march, again, that breaks in upon the quintet, seems to be all one tune, but the first five bars of it are 'The Queen's Birthday,' from Sharp's eleventh volume, the immediately following bars are 'Jenny come tie,' from the eighth set, and the finish is from 'The Queen's Birthday' again. After about a dozen readings of the score and two performances of the opera, in fact, I am more astonished than at first at the skill with which the musical tissue has been put together; and I can only say once more that if anyone thinks this kind of thing is easy, he has but to try his hand at it himself.

Neither the Manchester performance of the B.N.O.C. nor that at Golders Green, on April 20, quite did the work justice. Each had its good points, each its little failings. At the first performance there was naturally a general lack of confidence and ease; at the second, while everything ran more smoothly on the stage, and each individual performance was better, the quintet was scrambling and out of focus. The general style is a new one for our singers, and it tries some of them severely. We shall probably not see the Falstaff of Mr. Norman Allin or the Doll Tearsheet of Miss Constance Willis bettered, and the minor parts are all efficiently done. But Miss Treweek cannot persuade us that she is Shakespeare's Dame Quickly, and Mr. Tudor Davies makes Prince Hal too much of a conventional figure from Italian opera. The first thing necessary in a work of this kind is to get the racy, pithy text over to the audience with all its natural vigour and pungency; and this is impossible unless the voice is well forward and the tongue trained to articulate swiftly and pointedly in music. In order that the words shall tell, Holst has kept the orchestra down throughout, and refrained from much symphonic elaboration. If, then, the singers do not reach us with the text, and with the proper bite in every accent, we are left high and dry, without the orchestral flood of tone that in other operas can compensate us for a temporary failure on the stage.

The charge of monotony to which I have already referred is æsthetically not wholly unjustified. I should phrase it otherwise, however; what the opera needs is, as I have put it elsewhere, airing and spacing. The texture is all good, but it is too continuous. Holst has been too prodigal, as Hugo Wolf was in 'Der Corregidor,' the fault of which is not that it has too little fine music in it, but that it has too much. In both works, not enough concession is made to that weakness of theatrical human nature that demands moments of relief in order the better to savour a good thing. There are not enough doors and windows in the score, not enough mere plain-carpeted and unfurnished corridors in which we can relax a little while we go on from one room full of good things to another. The importance of all this is realised when we listen to 'Gianni Schicchi' after 'At the Boar's Head.' Puccini and his librettist are cunning old hands at the theatrical game. They make their dramatic and musical line a series of leaps above the plain and returns to the sea-level: Holst keeps us on virtually the same level throughout, gives us too little room to turn round in, and keeps our attention too constantly strung up. If he could stretch the line out a little thinner here and relax it a little there, and give us more time to take our breath in this flood of words every one of which is too good to miss, the opera could be made a sure stage success. But even as it is, 'At the Boar's Head' is a feast of good things, and a remarkably clever experiment in a quite new form.

SOME IDEAS ON THE CONCERT PROBLEM

By KAIKHOSRU SORABJI

There has been much talk lately of matters concerning concert-giving—how to make them a paying proposition, how to attract audiences, and how to exterminate the dead-head 'abuse.' But as usually happens in such newspaper discussions the matter has been skimmed round, and the essential matters either overlooked or ignored, and that so pointedly that one is more than a little inclined to suspect a tacitly, if not explicitly, concerted action. We all know these journalistic controversies of which the last aim is getting to the heart of the matter, and the first, and only, as a rule, the filling up of newspaper space. Some time ago I made observations on this subject in one of my New Age articles, but as the matter is as insistent then as now, no apology is needed for further reflections of a like nature. No one has apparently had the commonsense to draw attention to the fact that concerts in London take place, at the height of the season, at the rate of from anything between forty and seventy—and perhaps more—a week ; that of those it is safe to say that not more than one or two at the most are worth going to and paying for the privilege of going to ; that the number of artists who make money out of recitals is so small that they can be counted on the fingers of one hand ; that it is a sheer impossibility that such numbers, with the minute public of concert-goers in London—minute as compared with the population, and at most a few thousand out of millions—could under any circumstances pay, as there is not the public to support them. As I have pointed out before, the keen music-lover and concert-goer is generally a person of very limited means. One or two concerts a week are the most that he can run to, and naturally he will spend his money only on the best ; it is, therefore, grotesque and impossible that all the swarms of second- and third-raters can expect to make money by concert-giving, and, indeed, it is perfectly clear that hardly any of them do. Seventy-five per cent., I think it is safe to say, of all the concerts given in London, are purely and simply a form of publicity, a bait wherewith to attract press-notices to use as levers to securing engagements in the provinces, at other concerts, and abroad. Under these circumstances to thunder against the dead-head is merely stupid, when it is not dishonest. An artist is giving, let us say, a recital, for the purposes I have mentioned above ; he does not expect to make anything by it, but reckons on a cost of, say, £75. He knows that he cannot hope to attract a large paying audience, and the spectacle of about a couple of dozen people in a hall seating several hundred is neither reasonable nor pleasant. He therefore has recourse to his only means of getting an audience—that is, liberal papering. But to abuse the people who are used for the papering is as absurd as it is unjust. The only thing that can really be taken exception to is the way in which the papering is so often done. No intelligent and experienced concert-goer needs to have his attention drawn to the extraordinary people who can be seen stealing with an air of slinking self-consciousness to seats for which they palpably have not paid, and would not pay if they could—possibly quite wisely ; people who, under ordinary circumstances, never go inside a concert-hall, who are totally unfamiliar with their surroundings, and who have an air of wonder and dread as to what is going to happen to them next. But when musicians or writers on music of some standing ask, for purposes of criticism or review, for the customary professional privilege—in the case of concerts which every one knows cannot attract an audience of a paying public—and receive (as has happened to the present writer) an absurd printed slip informing them that owing to the great demand for tickets it is not possible to grant the privilege, and when—doubting the silly subterfuge—they have had the curiosity to buy a ticket and find for themselves a half-empty hall with appreciable numbers of what may be called the dead-head dummy type in it, they cannot but wonder at the mentality of both concert-agents and concert-givers, and repeat Quem Deus perdere vult, prius insanit.

Again, in a venture of the unheard-of precariousness and uncertainty of concert-giving, it seems almost inconceivable that artists should neglect to insist upon some system of co-ordination whereby events of prime interest are saved from the risk of clashing, if occurring on the same day and hour, as happens with a frequency that is desolating, and worthy only of Bedlam. It should be easy enough. Concert-halls are booked up months in advance, and it would be the simplest thing in the world for advance fixture lists to pass from agent to agent, so that they could arrange their artists' concerts without the chaos that at present prevails, and which in the long run cannot but injure the agents themselves. An instance only too typical occurred not so very long ago. On one Saturday afternoon, after weeks of nothing of the slightest importance or interest, weeks empty of a first-class concert or recital, there took place at the same hour three events of prime interest from the concert-goer's point of view ! A recital after long absence by Moiseiwitsch at Queen's, the Flonzaley Quartet at Wigmore, and one of Ravel's rare appearances, with a couple of new works at Æolian Hall ! Stupidity could go no further ! It will perhaps be argued that the people who go to hear a popular pianist such as Moiseiwitsch would not go to hear the Flonzaley Quartet or Ravel, but it is perfectly conceivable that many at each would have been glad to go to either of the others had all three not clashed in this preposterous manner. It is no good pointing to the ten-thousand audience gathered to hear a Galli-Curci, for no one will surely be so simple as to pretend that an audience of that kind has the slightest interest in music apart from high notes and the 'human appeal' of months of sedulous and remorseless press-stunting—that, like all press-stunting, concerns itself with the sweet, lovable nature of the singer, her earnings, her likes and dislikes, her impressions of London, her thoughts on nothing in general, and anything conceivable almost but her merits as an artist, naturally the last thing to interest a potential ten-thousand Albert Hall audience on a Sunday afternoon. People of that sort never go near a decent concert, and they form no part of the tiny, microscopic number of regular and enthusiastic concert-goers and music-lovers on whom music in London depends for its sole support.

Then there is the sore question of programmes. An inspection of some two dozen or so advance programmes taken from the stands of Queen's Hall, the Æolian, the Wigmore, reveals repetitive monotony and dull lack of enterprise that are simply desolating. Season after season, concert after concert, year after year, the same narrow round of threadbare works, which, having been heard at the hands of the supreme masters of interpretation, no one wants to hear from third- and downward-raters, except their adoring relatives and friends and—their worst enemies : the two are generally synonymous. But of course the most eminent artists are almost the worst offenders in this respect. In the space of a fortnight during the last season the 'Appassionata' could have been heard some half a dozen times. But Op. 111, an infinitely greater work, belonging absolutely to another universe than the much-pummelled 'Appassionata,' we are lucky if we hear once a year.

It may be suggested—as some think and hope—that the feverish, frenzied mania for concert-giving will in the end 'die by its own too-much,' and that the sort of thing we witness at the height of any London concert-season is merely the last hectic spasms of activity before the public concert declines, and finally disappears altogether. To those to whom music is almost a religion, the prospect of the total disappearance is not welcome, for they regard a great performance of master works as a kind of religious celebration, and to them the loss would be as awful as would the deprivation of the celebration of High Mass—one of the greatest and perhaps the greatest spiritual experience left to the modern world, surely supreme among rituals in emotional expressiveness and artistic completeness—be to a devoted and devout Catholic. But the disappearance of ninety per cent. of concerts—and concert-givers—would be an immense service to music, and would be the greatest preventive (or at least would put a stop to) the systematic debasement of standards by third-, fourth-, and other raters. How this can fail to happen, with the enormous and ever-increasing diffusion of wireless, it is not easy to see. The music-loving part of the public will be still more difficult to entice to concerts by nobodies when they can listen nightly to performances at least as good from the broadcasting stations. Hence, I suppose, the outcry against wireless, an outcry in which it is noticeable that no artist of the first order has joined, for they know it cannot touch them. The same remarks are also applicable to the gramophone in some of its rather surprising later developments of recording—as, for example, in the case of that remarkable instrument the New Edison. In fact, the gramophone does more; it will actually drive away from a concert one who is already there. It certainly does that to me often. When, for instance, having gone to a Promenade to hear a certain work, there is a singer announced to sing a Handel or Mozart aria, what conceivable inducement is there to sit and endure the murder of that which I can hear sung by such supreme singers and interpreters as de Gogorza, Evan Williams, Bavrientos, or Onegin?

Again, music suffers from the monstrous delusion that it is a thing which must be made to pay literally in cash, and the still more monstrous necessity that in order to exist—in England, at any rate—it has to be made to pay. That, of course, is the result of the ruthless and utterly anti-human and humane industrialisation which England and the rest of Europe—in varying degrees of acuteness, according to how far gone different parts of it were in the disease—is gradually discovering to be the almost unmitigated curse, the hideous blight on all the highest and best, most gracious and beautiful in life, which it is. Perhaps there will come a time when the notion of asking of music that it shall pay, and compelling musicians or any artists to prostitute their souls under duress of depriving them of the barest means of physical existence, will be looked on as equally horrible as the idea would seem to any decent human being now of asking him whether the highest and sincerest emotions of which he was capable paid him to feel them, and that if this didn't, demanding what right he had to feel them. But then, of course, decent human beings . . . Une chaumière et un cœur. Ce n'est pas si ridicule : il y a de ces jolies chaumières ! Malheureusement les cœurs sont rares.

Sir Frederic Cowen will be the guest of honour at a dinner to be given by the Music Club at the Hotel Cecil on Thursday, May 14, at 7.15 for 7.45—a well-deserved tribute to Sir Frederic's sixty years' service to music. The chair will be taken by Mr. T. P. O'Connor. Tickets are to be had from the hon. secretary of the Music Club, Mrs. Rose K. Farebrother, 19, Berners Street, W.1.

Hither Green Choral and Orchestral Society, now in its twenty-third season, gave a very praiseworthy performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' on March 28, under Mr. Ernest Dumayne.

TWO PATRIOTIC SONGS BY HANDEL

By Arthur M. Friedlander

The object of this brief article is to bring forward what may not be generally known to the British public—nay, more, to British musicians—the very interesting fact that Handel composed music for a patriotic song, during the time of the Great Rebellion, for a particular corps of the British Army, viz., the Gentlemen Volunteers of the City of London,* which the writer of these lines ventures to think worthy of receiving more publicity than that afforded to possessors, like himself, of a copy of the London Magazine, dated November, 1745, and to visitors to the British Museum who are interested in research work connected with Handel's compositions.

On inquiry of Mr. W. C. Smith, Department of Printed Books, British Museum, he kindly informed me that the song was there. I found it was printed on a single sheet, folio, without any date or name of the publisher!

Before entering into further details in connection therewith, mention should also be made of the composer's 'Song on the Victory obtained over the Rebels by His Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland,' which is to be found in the issue of the above-mentioned journal for 1746.

There are no less than four other publications of this song on single sheets, folio, in the Museum. Whilst three copies have an added instrumental part to the chorus, which is missing from the other copy and that of the magazine, two copies contain a slight variation in the concluding words of the first verse. Instead of 'all nature looks gay,' there is, 'all nature's gay.'

On subsequent visits to the Reading Room, I consulted the catalogue of secular manuscript music, thinking perhaps that Handel's original scores might be mentioned therein. Though this did not prove to be so, there was a reference to a manuscript copy of the 'Song for the Volunteers,' which was made by Michael Rophino Lacey, either from the original at Buckingham Palace, or elsewhere. This I procured, and on examination of it found that the sheet folio copy was slightly more correct than that in the magazine. A touch of humour, found in connection with my inspection of the manuscript, consisted in the statement made in pencil at the heading, 'no time marked,' whereas the sign 𝄵 is actually marked in the first bar!

Eventually I approached Mr. W. Barclay Squire, Curator of the music on loan from the King's library at Buckingham Palace, as to Handel's autograph score being in this collection. But he has not been able to trace it. At the same time, he kindly informed me that the song was reprinted by him, in a paper on 'Handel in 1745' written for the Reimann Festschrift in 1909.

On perusal of this I find the following statement:

> Whether all this stir of patriotism roused Handel, or whether he received a commission from the theatre, it is impossible to say, but on November 14 the General Advertiser announced that at Drury Lane that evening there would be sung, at the end of the play of 'The Relapse,' a Chorus Song set by Mr. Handel for the Gentlemen Volunteers of the City of London.

* Major A. G. Parkyn, Librarian, Royal United Service Institution, has informed me in connection with the Volunteer Movement of 1745, that 'These Corps were originally raised in 1744, and were called the Gentlemen Volunteers of the City of London.' In connection therewith readers are referred to 'A History of the Volunteer Forces.' By Cecil Sebag-Montefiore.

To this I would add : While it is feasible to think that Handel received some monetary benefit for the use of his song at the theatre, it is highly probable that he originally composed it for the purpose stated at its heading.

As bearing upon the subject as to whether Handel received a commission from the theatre, it may be of interest to compare the following from Julian Marshall's article on the composer in Grove :

> . . . at the end of the season 1744-45 he was again bankrupt, and seems to have been, for the time, overwhelmed by his failure, for during a year and a half he wrote scarcely anything.

In view of these circumstances, Handel may also have been led to contribute the song under notice to the London Magazine.

Adverting once more to Mr. Squire's paper, I find he has not mentioned some rather interesting details in connection with the song which I have culled from the General Advertiser, November 15, 1745.

On the front page of this issue occurs the following announcement :

> Last night the Song compos'd by Mr. Handel, for the Gentlemen Volunteers of the City of London was perform'd at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, with universal applause.

In the theatrical advertisement, it states in reference to the second performance of the song ('by particular desire').

Of no less interest is the following advertisement which also occurs in the same issue :

> New Musick.
> This Day is published
> A Song made for the Gentlemen Volunteers of the City of London, and sung by Mr. Lowe, at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane. Set to Musick by Mr. Handel.
> Printed for John Simpson, opposite the East Door of the Royal Exchange.

Quite as important, if not even more so, is the fact that although Mr. Squire alludes to the copies of both songs in the London Magazine, and those of the sheets, folio, he has neither mentioned the existence of the manuscript copy of the 'Song for the Volunteers,' which I have seen in the Museum, nor has he even stated—a matter of considerable consequence and interest—anything in regard to Handel's autograph copy.

Perhaps my bringing forth this fresh evidence may be the means of ascertaining the whereabouts of Handel's manuscript. Even apart from consideration of these details, it is very gratifying to find that the results of the investigations which the present writer has achieved in connection with these unique songs, which are of historical and patriotic value, are made known to the public through the medium of a British musical journal.

On comparing the MS. version of the 'Song for the Volunteers,' and that of the short folio with that contained in the magazine, it is found that the latter has possibly a misprint for the first bass note (E instead of D) of the third bar after the first double-bar, the eliminations of the figure 6 under the first bass note of the fifth bar before the close, and the words Da capo in the last bar.

In regard to both songs as they appear in the periodical, and which are here reproduced, it should be stated in connection with the first, that only the voice and figured bass parts are given. The inner parts have been added by the present writer, who has also put in the notes that appear in small type to the concluding phrase, which in the original version seems rather bald, being only a bass part.

As to the second song, he has also added therein the inner parts, the bass not being figured. Moreover, the additional instrumental part to the chorus, which is omitted from the magazine copy, has also been inserted, as well as some marks of expression which were not in the original copies.

What a splendid contrast do we find in these songs ! Whilst the first is a fine specimen of a sturdy and stirring tune, the second is a splendid example of light, joyous, and gay music.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Bizet.' Par Paul Landormy ('Les Maîtres de la Musique').

[Paris: Alcan, 7 fr. 50 c.]

'Carmen' de Bizet. Par Charles Gaudier ('Les Chefs-d'Œuvre de la Musique').

[Paris: Mellottée, 3 fr. 50 c.]

It is fifty years since Bizet's death. 'Carmen' saw the light on March 3, 1875, at the Opéra-Comique, Paris. Bizet died on June 3 following, aged thirty-six. It is natural to deplore the early death of so many men of genius, but let us at the same time be grateful for what they were allowed to do. Bizet might have died at thirty-five. Then, apart from the charming 'Arlésienne' scraps, there would be nothing to keep his name green.

And moreover (if we wish to invent consolations) there is the possibility that if Bizet had lived until to-day he might not have added to the glory of 'Carmen.' After all, Gounod lived long, but do we of 1925 feel any special cause for gratitude that he did not soon die after writing 'Faust'? We should have lost a few pretty little things, but we should have been spared others, and might have been exercising our fancy to-day on the unwritten masterpieces of a frustrated Gounod's lost maturity.

The brilliant beauties of 'Carmen' are in the nature of a happy accident, which occurred to a commonplace and rather unattractive man—how, neither of the authors of these jubilee books can tell us. How poverty-stricken are Bizet's other operas Londoners know from the recent Beecham revivals of 'The Pearl-Fishers' (1863), 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (1867), and 'Djamileh' (1872). But after these came the dazzling 'Carmen,' which holds the field still, and promises to hold it long.

* The tenour of the poem, which runs to five stanzas, is sufficiently expressed in the words here given

These two little books overlap, but both are good, and to M. Landormy one is especially grateful for a fairly critical attitude. In these days of musical nationalism it is uncommon to hear a French critic speak plainly of one of the national idols.

Bizet came of a musical family, in which it seemed quite natural for him to enter the Conservatoire at the age of nine. He becomes an altogether remarkable pianist, and as a score-reader can astonish even Liszt. As a youth and 'Prix de Rome' he has a rather artless outlook. He associates Rossini with Mozart ('the two greatest musicians'), as opposed to Beethoven and Meyerbeer, the masters, in his eyes, of 'dramatic passion' instead of 'pure and facile art.' M. Landormy deduces that 'Bizet had no very sure or delicate taste, and we shall have plenty of further occasions to notice this.' One of his teachers at Paris prophesied, 'He will never be a dramatic composer, for he has not a pennyworth of enthusiasm.'

For this he has been ridiculed. Our author, however, asks:

> But was Bizet indeed an enthusiast? We shall see him speaking so frigidly of his art, calculating the profits of it with so material a mind, making plans wherein noble ambition and a high ideal count for so little, but greed for immediate success so much—popular success, the success that is reckoned in sound, clinking cash. . . . If one day he happens to write this 'Carmen' which is so to upset his contemporaries, no doubt it is in spite of himself and under the illusion that he is going the way to please them. Genius speaks louder in him than character. . . . In no artist is the truth made plainer that a man may profoundly differ from the genius which leads him, and can even struggle against that mysterious force which is like a stranger to him, and can do his best to stifle it.

But M. Landormy is a thought severe on the young Bizet's letter home in which he names his first goal as the earning of 100,000 francs ('just two little successes in comic-opera'), so that his father may give up music-lessons, and the family live happy ever after on their income. Bizet is a lively letter-writer. Here he has been earning hard cash (as Wagner, too, did, with even more distaste) by scoring dance-music:

> Oh, but I have had my revenge! I have made that orchestra more caddish than its nature is! The cornet utters the howls you hear at a low-down fair-ground. The ophicleide and the big drum delightfully mark the first beat of the bar along with the bass trombone and 'cellos and double-basses, while the second and third are bludgeoned by the horns, violas, second violins, two first trombones, and the side-drum. Yes, the side-drum! If you could only see the viola part! And there are poor wretches who spend their lives playing such stuff.

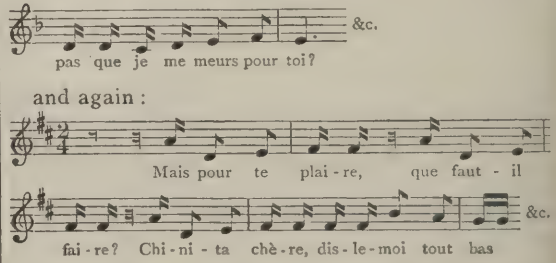
Bizet's earlier operas were all comparative failures, and 'Carmen,' though it had some thirty performances before his death, was badly received. The plot shocked the middle-class supporters of the Opéra-Comique—a 'family theatre,' where Carmen's behaviour was an innovation. And the newspapers, strange to say, detected 'Wagnerianism' in the score. Many of those critics—Time has a way of avenging the wrongs of the critics' victims!—lived to see Nietzsche extravagantly exalting Bizet as Anti-Wagner. 'Carmen' was played fifty times in 1875-76, and then dropped completely by Paris for eight years. In 1883 its triumphs there began (it had meanwhile conquered the world), and December 23, 1904, saw the thousandth Paris performance.

M. Landormy will not have it that the hostility to 'Carmen' brought about Bizet's death. 'What killed Bizet so early, or at least helped to hasten his end, was overwork, that terrible overwork which he saddled himself with all his life.' And letters are quoted to illustrate the feverish activity of the man with lessons, odd-jobs for publishers, and pot-boiling compositions:

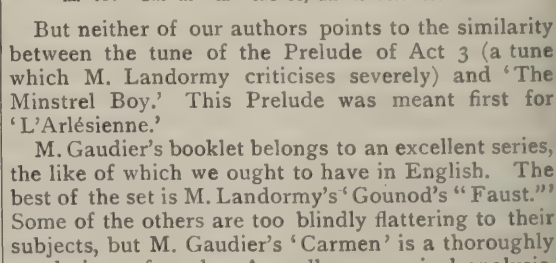
> Bizet was a worker, a hard worker, a good musical artizan. . . . Reflection, critical spirit, high culture, general ideas—such things were hardly his. His intellectual field was pretty narrow. . . . The best in him was instinctive, and there is little to explore in his nature if we leave out what gives it for us its value—its inestimable price—namely, that mysterious and purely musical genius, outside of whose occasional manifestations Bizet was, to be frank, nothing but an ordinary man.

In some pages of the very early Bizet this critic detects here and there delicacies reminiscent of Gounod and, through him, of Mozart. The libretto of 'The Pearl-Fishers' is termed 'pitiable,' and the music 'generally colourless, lifeless, and without any personal touch.' As for 'The Fair Maid of Perth,' 'the music's indigence perhaps outdoes in places the worst of the poverty of "The Pearl-Fishers."' But the Gipsy Dance and Ralph's Drinking Song are redeeming spots. 'The one page of "Djamileh" truly worth saving from oblivion is the delightful Lamento, so pure in line, in feeling so simple and touching.' M. Landormy dismisses Bizet's songs, but calls attention to a set of pianoforte duets, 'Jeux d'Enfants'—'wholly charming and worth being better known.'

If M. Landormy has been severe, he makes up in his pages on 'L'Arlésienne' and 'Carmen,' and as he still remains a vivacious critic, not lost in admiration, these pages are eminently readable. Bizet was never in Spain, and 'Carmen' is practically untouched by real Spanish folk-song, but both these authors quote the original of the Habañera. It comes from an album of 'Spanish songs by the Maëstro Yradier' (Paris, 1864). It begins:



and again:



But neither of our authors points to the similarity between the tune of the Prelude of Act 3 (a tune which M. Landormy criticises severely) and 'The Minstrel Boy.' This Prelude was meant first for 'L'Arlésienne.'

M. Gaudier's booklet belongs to an excellent series, the like of which we ought to have in English. The best of the set is M. Landormy's 'Gounod's "Faust."' Some of the others are too blindly flattering to their subjects, but M. Gaudier's 'Carmen' is a thoroughly good piece of work. As well as a musical analysis, there is an account of the origin of the libretto, and much about the first production (with extracts from the press), and about famous singers who have shone in the opera.

'The Répertoire of the Modern Organist.' By R. Walker Robson.

[Musical Opinion Office, 3*s*.]

Strictly speaking, this book treats of the répertoire of a modern organist; the choice of the article is important. Dr. Robson takes us through his music shelves and gives us interesting comments on the various numbers. Naturally his choice will not be that of all his readers, but most of the complaints will be on the score of omissions. Clearly there are a good many excellent organ works waiting to be added to his library. For example, he appears to possess only one of Jongen's admirable pieces, the 'Chant de Mai.' He should explore further, and make acquaintance with the beautiful 'Prière' and the rest of the set of four pieces to which it belongs. Again, Stanford is seen at his best not in the Sonatas, but in the two sets of Preludes and Postludes, and in the Fantasia and Fugue, the latter being a beautiful Brahmsian movement of which one does not easily tire. None of these find mention. Nor do we see the name of John E. West—a composer with a longish list of excellent pieces to his credit. Boëllmann's two Suites are worthy of their place, but many organists will regard the set of Twelve Pieces as being more useful. Overmuch space is given to Louis Vierne at the expense of other and better-wearing composers. Some of Dr. Robson's comments are questionable. For example, the reader who obtains the specified arrangement of Arensky's 'Basso Ostinato' will find it by no means of 'quite moderate difficulty,' as it abounds in ungrateful cross-rhythms, and has an unnecessarily difficult pedal part. Perhaps the present writer, after duly thanking Dr. Robson for his appreciative remarks on a certain Rhapsody, may be allowed to protest mildly against the injunction that in its performance 'strict time must be avoided at all costs.' He has heard it avoided—at the cost of such rhythmic life as the Rhapsody possesses. Too great a cost, surely! There is so much deliberate avoidance of strict time among players to-day that the advice needed is rather 'Don't avoid strict time without a jolly good reason.' There is a slip in the note on one of the Franck works. Dr. Robson speaks of 'Prelude, Fugue, and Variations.' There is only one variation, consisting of a repetition of the Prelude with the accompaniment elaborated. Despite a good many curious omissions—only a small proportion are mentioned above—this little book is of interest and value to organ players, whether in church or concert-hall. H. G.

'The Physical Basis of Piano Touch and Tone: An experimental investigation of the effect of the player's touch upon the tone of the piano.' By Otto Ortmann.

This is the sort of book that should please everybody—both those who play and those who listen. What, for instance, could be more encouraging for Miss Cicely Blank, who is looking forward to giving her first recital at Wigmore Hall in the coming season, than to be told that her interpretation of Chopin's fourth Ballade differs from Paderewski's only in mere variations of key-speed and time-duration? Yet she may gather such from the first words of the preface of Otto Ortmann's coldly precise and scientific work, which he has given to the world as the fruit of continued experiment in the laboratory of the Peabody Conservatory of Music. And what could be more encouraging to those whose ears have suffered from the grossness of tone which characterises so much modern pianoforte playing than to see some attempt made to explain it on a physical basis?

Pianoforte tone has remained a mystery, blessed or unblessed as the case may be. We recognise its varieties. Hoffmann has a staccato unlike that of any other virtuoso, Petri can produce a glowing warmth from the middle register of the instrument which is unique of its kind, Paderewski draws a dry cantabile from his Erard that once heard is not easily forgotten. Yet how many pianists could explain the action of the instruments through which they attempt to sway and charm their fellow mortals? It is on this mechanism, nevertheless, that their whole art, leaving aside the consideration of the pedal, depends. Some, as our investigator says, are content that it shall remain a mystery, others assert that the most subtle shades of emotion are actually transmitted to and through this action by individual spiritual differences of touch. It is such cloudy thinking that Mr. Ortmann has set himself to dissipate. He takes the pianoforte, an instrument with keys, pedals, strings, sounding-board, and some etceteras, and investigates the physical laws to which it is obedient. His method has been purely empirical. He has recorded touch and tone scientifically in his laboratory and submitted them to analysis, with the results contained in the present volume.

It is not nearly so formidable as it looks at first sight. To those whose investigations into the science of energy acting on matter ceased with their school-days, the introductory statement of physical principles is pleasantly reminiscent. Indeed, rude experience of life, in which, like the pianoforte, we receive more hard knocks than we give, makes one think that physics is an amiable science in stating as a general proposition that when two bodies, A and B, interact on each other, the force exerted by A on B is equal and opposite to that exerted by B on A. This by the way, however. The graphs, of which there are many, are easy enough for those who understand such things, whilst others who don't can always adopt the plan of looking at them steadily and then passing on without illumination or regret. And no reader, howsoever great his indolence, can remain in doubt as to Mr. Ortmann's argument, for every chapter has its summary for those who skip, with conclusions neatly docketed.

Exactly what those are and how he reaches them remain for the reader to discover. One can only indicate some of the points that he makes. How refreshingly is the whole question of touch summed up?

> No matter how we hold our hands, how gently or harshly we strike or stroke the key, no matter how relaxed or rigid our arms are, how curved or flat our fingers, we can do nothing else to the key than move it three-eighths of an inch, or less, vertically downwards.

With reference to their effect on the descent of the key, Mr. Ortmann recognises only two touches—the percussive and the non-percussive, the one being that in which the moving finger strikes the key surface, in the other the finger resting on the surface of the key before descent. For the rest, for differences of tonal colour, the only thing that matters is the speed at which the key is made to descend, or, in other words, the velocity with which the hammer strikes the strings. This ranges from 5-ft. to 60-ft. per second. The amount of energy required of course varies enormously. The Chopin D flat Waltz, 'using three ounces for single tone-production and a pp touch throughout, would demand a minimum expenditure of force of 235 lbs. For the Liszt B minor Sonata his estimate of 25,000 lbs. will receive the sorrowful assent of those music critics who find themselves destined to hear this work too often for the good of their souls. An entertaining list of terms of musical expression translated into their tonal qualities as registered in the laboratory show that doloroso and lamentoso had no effect other than slow tempo, whilst mesto, pietoso, and religioso had no effect at all. Espressivo is obviously safer. And since these tonal qualities in other cases always arose from variations in the intensity and duration of the tones, physics was justified.

It is all very refreshing to see the soul of pianoforte playing thus laid bare, and to know that so far as the 'auditory stimulation' is concerned every pianistic effect embracing all the shades of emotion can be fully explained in terms of its physical attributes. And when these fail it is not physics that is to blame. It is merely that the playing of the pianoforte does not appeal entirely to the ear, but is also concerned with other 'nerve departments,' chief amongst which are the 'kinæsthetic and the visual senses.' In view of the excellent sense Mr. Ortmann has given us in this book, it would be an ungrateful man who would quarrel with him on the larger side of the claims that he makes. Every pianist who reads this book will learn a lot that he ought to know, and may understand the reasons, if he cannot provide the remedy, for the ungrateful tone that he surely produces with greater or less frequency. One of the most interesting and original chapters is that on the noise element. Careful experiment enabled the four constituent parts that make up the noise (as opposed to the tonal) element in pianoforte playing to be appreciated, and to give the non-percussive touch yet another good mark. It is clear from reading Mr. Ortmann that the more this touch is cultivated the more essentially musical is the result. W.

'The Nightingale' (a Life of Chopin). By Marjorie Strachey.

[Longmans, Green, & Co., 7*s.* 6*d.*]

Biography cast in the form of a novel is a difficult type to handle, unless the life concerned happens to be of the eventful sort. Even then the author is in constant danger of falling between the two stools of fact and imagination. Chopin's life presents unusual difficulties, because the working part of it was both short and uneventful. On the whole this attempt turns out better than its early section promises. Perhaps over-much space is devoted to the composer's childhood. There is a good deal of musical interest later, and the author has committed none of the 'howlers' that usually distinguish novels in which the art figures. If the picture of the circle in which the composer spent his closing years is not overdrawn, we need not wonder that his end was premature. So squalid a crew might well hasten the death of such a sensitive plant as Chopin. C. W.

NEW SONGS

It is depressing to find so many good starts, and yet so few songs that are good all through, and good as a whole. On the one hand there are composers whose technique is perfect, but who have little or nothing to say; and on the other those who in spite of extreme technical weakness somehow convince us that they have felt sincerely and individually. Robin Milford is rather in the last position. It seems to us a pity that he should have rushed into print with 'The Moor' (Oxford University Press), which contains many unnecessary weaknesses, for it is a sincere song, and fresh, with feeling behind it, and might have been made so much better. Of the former class is Sir Landon Ronald: his 'Sunset Land,' a set of songs published by Enoch, is written with all the composer's facility and knowledge of effect, to words by A. L. Salmon, containing the usual ingredients. 'Little white children hand in hand,' 'the misty moon,' and 'lilies of remembrance,' will go down well with the public for whom Sir Landon caters. Also published by Enoch are 'Carillion,' (sic), an effective, unpretentious song by Easthope Martin; 'The Shepherdess,' by Dermot MacMurrough, simple and singable, but rather high-handed with its lovely poem; and 'Promenade,' by Gordon Bryan, a song which never gets under way at all, through being so determined not to be commonplace. From Curwens come four songs by Rupert Erlebach, 'Phœbus' and 'Three English Songs' (in one volume). Mr. Erlebach writes good tunes of a folk-song character, and 'Phœbus' should be a jolly thing to sing. 'In youth is pleasure' is attractive, too—difficult, but well-written. Arthur Benjamin also writes good tunes, and arranges them with skill and a peculiar delicacy of his own. 'Before Dawn' is a charming Christmas song, full of all the tricks of the day, but effective and musicianly. 'Diaphenia' is good, too, and the others are clever. 'The Wasp' seems, however, little more than that: it has no real sting, and is very difficult in a finnicky fashion. Hugo Anson is not influenced in the same way by folk-song, but, as 'Last Night' shows, can write, good, long, vocal phrases: his music admirably suits the rather heavily-emotional words of Darley, and the song has climax. His biggest song, 'On the Shore,' is an ambitious thing, and difficult for accompanist as well as singer; it is rather doubtful if it will come off, but it is amply worth study. 'Full Moon' is a 'jeu d'esprit,' the sort of thing one calls 'rather fun' when rehearsing it, but its hand is heavy upon Miss Sackville-West's charming and capricious poem. All these songs are published by Curwen. What a treat it is, in passing, to find that composers are choosing to set such good poems nowadays. They are certainly going to the best of both classical and modern poetry for their inspiration.

John Ireland has set Symons's 'Santa Chiara,' but I do not think it one of his most successful songs. It has a good beginning, and on page 2 seems to be heading for something really big; but the poem is short, and the song over before the big moment comes, and we are left disappointed. The song seems too short for the amount of stuff it contains. Augeners, who publish it, also publish four songs from the Chinese by Phillis M. James. 'Your Garden Flower' seems to me the best; it is an unaffected little serenade, with some charming touches in the accompaniment. There is also 'April Mist,' G. O'Connor Morris's Op. 2, which has been newly revised by the composer.

Peter Warlock's songs come from all quarters. Here are two from Paterson's, of Edinburgh, and very good they are The first is, 'In an arbour green,' the second, 'Peter Warlock's Fancy.' This last is a splendid tune of the chanty type, for baritone and chorus, with a Grainger-like accompaniment, which is fine fun to play. His other songs, a group of three, published by Chester, are very different. They are called 'Saudades' ('the haunting sense of sadness and regret for days gone by which the Portuguese call 'Saudades'), and are, one may say at once, of extreme difficulty. The voice sings, as it were to itself, a skilfully planned declamation, while the accompaniment supplies the emotional background. The music is extremely elusive, both in harmony and rhythm (two of the songs are unbarred, which probably adds unnecessarily to their difficulty), and calls for the greatest skill from both performers. The difficulty is not of the virtuoso type, but more an affair of interpretation and musicianship: the slightest lack of sympathy would ruin the whole effect. 'Heraclitus,' the last of the set, especially, is a most beautiful and moving song, which catches perfectly the intimacy of the sadness of Cory's poem. These songs do not yield their secret at a first hearing, but if they are difficult they are splendidly worth while. Mr. Warlock not only feels, but feels with quality, and that is the rare thing.

From the same publishers come four songs by Timothy Mather Spelman, a composer who enjoys in America a great reputation which we feel must rest on other works than these. There are also from Chesters four songs by Herbert Bedford, who obviously has a great command of both vocal and instrumental effect. 'The Coming of Love' might be made very effective. But although Mr. Bedford is a composer of great experience, he still shows clearly the influences that formed him; and one is obliged to say that the rather pretentious lay-out of these songs seems only to emphasise the fact that they are essentially commonplace. Gerald Cooper has added two numbers to the Tudor Edition which Chesters are producing. The first contains two songs by Caccini, the second four duets by Robert Jones. Our interest in Caccini is, one confesses, mainly antiquarian, though it is exceedingly interesting to see Dowland's working of Caccini's figured bass, which, as the editor remarks, may well prove a lesson to modern editors. With Robert Jones it is different: his four duets from 'A Musical Dream' (1609) are as full of life as ever they were. Set for Cantus and Altus (which works out as soprano and mezzo), they are certain to be popular. Although not easy to sing well, their difficulties are of the straightforward, honest kind, and the duets are so charming that they are well worth while.

From Novello comes a new arrangement of the 'Londonderry Air' by W. McNaught. This tune has lent itself a good deal to over-juicyness in harmonization, and it is good to find here a more restrained version. It is, however, not dull, but effective, with climax and plenty of interest. Altogether a good, sound piece of work. Last of all, and also from Novello, comes Sir Ivor Atkins's 'Too late.' It is indeed too late, for it is a rather melodramatic setting of very Victorian words by Matthew Arnold. But the song is well-written, effective, and sincere, and one is bound to confess that Sir Ivor does at any rate let himself go. He writes what he feels, and his music will find its mark among those who dislike the young men that scoff at sentiment. One feels about so many of these songs that the composers are afraid to let themselves go at all. Some might write good sentimental, some good light, some good comic songs, if they did not force themselves to write self-conscious, highbrow stuff. It is sad, but true, that unless you are more than talented, conscious avoidance of the commonplace produces only sterility.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Augeners have issued two pieces by Archy Rosenthal, Etude and Valse-Prelude, which, needless to say, are well written for the instrument. They would be effective if played with sufficient élan, but it cannot be said that they show much originality or distinction. From Evans come two sets of pieces by Percival Garratt, one volume containing Night Piece and Musette, the other, Four Portraits. The second set seems the better; there is a sense of humour about it, it does not take itself too seriously, and it has some charm and musicianship. These pieces are thoroughly pianistic, but not easy. Norman Peterkin's 'Dreamers' Tales' (rights of Winthrop Rogers), on the contrary, do seem rather over-elaborate for what they have to say. Each number of the four is prefaced by a quotation from Lord Dunsany's 'Idle days on the Yann,' and Mr. Peterkin works hard at his share of the Eastern atmosphere. There are effective moments, but the music is not distinguished. These pieces savour of having been written some years ago. Certainly one has heard music in which Mr. Peterkin seemed more definitely to have found himself.

'Mood Pictures, No. 1, Peaceful Mood,' by T. Haigh (Paxton), is a work of fewer pretentions and more distinction. Its first theme is good, and the whole thing shows careful and sensitive workmanship. From the same publishers come a set of Six Preludes by Harry Farjeon; they are marked Op. 56, but show no distinctive personality, and therefore lack interest. There is no lack of technique, plenty of effective pianoforte writing, and some pleasant effects, particularly in No. 5—yet there is nothing arresting in the music. 'John Kinross's 'Sea Shanty' (Forsyth) is a simple setting of a good tune. But whether it is a real shanty, or an imitation by Mr. Kinross, we are not told. The harmony is simple and suitable, and as the tune is mostly laid in the tenor compass, the piece is a useful study for tune-in-a-middle-part-playing.

The biggest music this month comes from Curwen. 'Puck in the Belfry,' by Hugo Anson, is a full-size Suite of four movements and considerable difficulty. There is stuff in Mr. Anson's music, but one feels here, as with his songs, that he has not yet found his own individuality. These pieces show great command of pianoforte effects. Roy Agnew's 'Poème Tragique' is a big effort too: though the quality of the music is uneven, the hearer is conscious that Mr. Agnew has something to say, and is genuinely trying to say it. Probably he knows well enough that he is more than influenced by Scriabin, who himself carried his manner as far as it will go, or farther: it would be too obvious to be commented upon if one did not feel that Mr. Agnew has a personality of his own to develop, without borrowing that of another man.

'In our Garden,' a Suite of four pieces, by Francis J. Morgan (Curwen), is interesting because its pianoforte writing is curiously apart from modern tendencies. It is neat and fluent, rather like Mendelssohn's, and requires clean finger technique. The music is light and attractive. Here and there, especially in middle sections, it narrowly misses being commonplace; but in the main it just avoids this.

Two Welsh Miniatures and Three Cymric Cameos by Gwynn Williams, also from Curwens, are quite nice little pieces, of no great difficulty. They are much influenced by modes and rhythms common in, but not peculiar to, Welsh folk-music, and they have some charm, particularly when, as in 'Sanctuary,' the composer uses or imitates a genuine folk-tune. But when all is said, the militant Welshness is more in the titles and covers than in the music, which might quite easily have been written by an English student. The present writer is not infuriated, as some people are, by the sliding fifths which form the harmony of 'A Singing Bard': and merely noted, in passing, that when used without relief this device gives the music a peculiarly constipated sound. The 'young Welsh Nationalist school of composers' seems a bit over-self-conscious about its Welshness.

Also from Curwens comes a pianoforte arrangement by the composer of Holst's 'Beni Mora' Suite. This music needs no introduction; and it is particularly interesting to see how it stands now with relation to Holst's later developments. The arrangement is quite playable on the pianoforte, but the music is too essentially orchestral to be really effective as a pianoforte solo. No doubt it was intended chiefly for students, and it would have been more useful to them if there had been indications of the orchestration, which there are not. Other arrangements are John Foulds's 'Le Cabaret' Overture (Paxton), 'Hornpipe,' by Norman O'Neill (Bosworth), and Frederick Rosse's 'Suite Tragique' (Bosworth). The last-named may be recommended to cinema pianists. 'Soliloquy of a Fallen Angel' has great possibility, and 'Variations sur le theme DEAD' seems to associate itself naturally with the 'movies.'

CHAMBER MUSIC

Messrs. Augener have added Schumann's Quartets in F and A to the A minor Quartet, the publication of which we discussed some time ago. Of the two, the Quartet in A is perhaps better known to amateurs than the example in F. The reason for this is to be found, if anywhere, in the more decided and characteristic first movement of the former. The Andante con variazioni of the F Quartet, however, compares very favourably with the Adagio of the A Quartet, and the concluding movements run fairly close—neither represents Schumann at his best. In both, however, are to be found pages as charming and as intimate as anything he wrote. An English edition of these great classical works has been long overdue.

VIOLIN MUSIC

In his arrangement for violin of Rubinstein's Valse Caprice (Paxton), Louis Godowsky is obviously concerned with matters of technique—not the technique of music, but the technique of the violin. No doubt he is right in thinking that one of the first considerations in transcribing a brilliant piece should be to maintain in the new version the brilliancy of the original. But there are ways and means of achieving this desirable end. Godowsky has taken the ways of the virtuoso, and made his arrangement inaccessible to violinists of anything below solo rank. And even soloists may be loth to tempt providence by leaping to high harmonics innumerable times. Of course, the mere leap to high B or E is easy enough, but to do it again and again is something of an ordeal, since nothing is more quickly noticed by the least-educated audience than a missed harmonic. This knowledge makes the player nervous, and that which may be child's play in the practice-room becomes a severe task in public. Moreover, I very much doubt whether Rubinstein's Valse is worth such elaborate treatment. Pianists have long forgotten it, and it does not seem very likely that violinists will be induced to revive it by this or any other transcription. By the way, bar 23, page 3 (violin part), is impossible as written. No violinist has ever played a scale of two octaves staccato in one beat at a quick pace. Perhaps Godowsky means arco gettato, in which case the passage will be possible—though not probable.

Paul Essek's 'Studies for Violin' (Gebrüder Hug) are not very ambitious, and do not aim at replacing the existing classics of technique. The author, who often bases his 'Study' on an existing model, frankly admits that his intention is only to bridge the gap between the Rovelli and the Gaviniés Studies. Some such bridge is already to be found, but Gaviniés offers unusual difficulty to students of a certain type. The development of technique is no less individual a thing than the development of mind or temperament. While some violinists will take to Gaviniés as readily as a duck takes to water, others may be very glad of yet another means by which to smooth their path and clear obstructions. The field of technique is so very wide that even a very promising technician may find some little corner of it unusually perverse. After all, the great masters themselves have their weak as well as their strong points.

The special interest of 'Four pieces by an unknown Dutch composer of the 18th century,' published by the same firm (English agent: E. W. Organ, Birmingham), lies perhaps in the apparent determination of foreign scholars to follow the English example and search their libraries for forgotten MSS. These four pieces (Andante, Scherzo, Allegretto, Largo-Allegro), edited by Willem de Boer, though good enough in their way, do not quite reach the standard of our own best sonatas for pianoforte and violin of the same period—e.g., the John Collett or the Vincent Sonatas. But they deserved publication both for their intrinsic value and for the reward they seem to promise to those engaged in righting past wrongs.

Easy and tasteful, the 'Madrigale' of Dom Thomas Symons (Winthrop Rogers) ought to find a place in the repertory of the young violinist who wants his music to be pleasant, interesting technically, and yet not difficult. The violin part does not go beyond the third position. Tone and phrasing, however, must be good before the delicate melody will reveal its simple charm.

More difficult in appearance is André Colomb's 'Ballade de la Lune' (Enoch), for the melody goes one position higher, and there are a couple of passages in double-stopping. But the difficulty is not real, since the support given by the pianoforte is, if simple, also most substantial. The pianist in fact doubles every note played by the violinist. This is hence a violin piece which can be played without a violinist. M. Colomb is a most accommodating composer. B. V.

'CELLO MUSIC

A book of Studies dealing with the first and half positions of the 'cello, by Ludwig Lebell (Joseph Williams), deserves to be commended chiefly for the obvious care taken in its compilation. The first book, which, so far, alone has reached us, consists of twenty-three well graduated exercises for students who have already mastered the rudiments of 'cello technique. They should be as beneficial to bowing as to the left hand.

Siegfried Jacoby's Bourrée for 'cello and pianoforte (Forsyth) is rather mild and not ungracious; conventional maybe, but also facile and fluent. Some people may talk of small beer, but we cannot forget that a great hero was not ashamed to acknowledge his fondness for the 'little creature.' Surely there must be many who like to pass a pleasant ten minutes reading and practising something which demands very moderate skill and still more moderate intellectual effort. B. V.

'CELLO AND PIANOFORTE

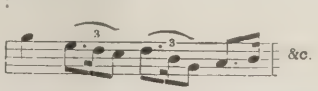
The Sonata in D for violoncello and pianoforte by Alexandre Tcherepnin (Durand) carries a little further on the way to their logical conclusion certain theories of modern harmony—the theory that one chord or one form is as good as another, the theory that compression makes for piquancy and presumably saves time. The first is apparent in the casual disposition of dissonances, some of which are excellent in themselves and exceedingly effective in their proper place. It is also seen in the construction of the Sonata, which, like its harmony, has no solid foundation but moves on from one fanciful episode to another. It may begin anywhere and it may end anywhere. The old composers built their music on a plan which was intended to satisfy to some extent the needs of human nature. We had a first movement embodying the composer's mood and feelings in such a way as to produce contrast and avoid monotony. There was a thoughtful, tender slow movement, and a brisk episode at the conclusion. It seemed so natural in those days to wish that people should leave the concert-hall in a happy frame of mind. Now that human nature has been changed, all that is unnecessary, and instead of the slow movement Tcherepnin gives us a short episode—one half of which is a cadenza—no meditation and no thoughtfulness.

The theory of compression is applied so effectively that the Sonata is both in D major and D minor, for there is hardly an F sharp which is not followed or preceded by an F natural, and the last chord consists of D, A, and both F's—sharp and natural. Thus the composer avoids the possibility of sending his audience home in a happy frame of mind. But whether or no they will discuss the tonality of the Sonata as the Russian moujik discusses the blessings of Bolshevism, is a problem which has still to be put to the test of actual practice.

I have said that these experiments carry us some way to the logical conclusion. That end will be reached only when two sticks of just proportion are cut which will press all the keys of the pianoforte simultaneously. That is the logical and, indeed, inevitable result of 'compression.' It is already existent in nature, and no stout-hearted futurist will quail before reality. It will be said, perhaps, that we should lose rhythm, design, &c. That may be. But in any case there is no progress without some loss; no advantage can be gained without some risk. On the other hand, the profit is clear and obvious—nothing to fetter the listener's imagination; music reduced to a symbol; and, above all, what a saving of time! B. V.

CLARINET MUSIC

New music for the clarinet is sufficiently scarce to make even a modest achievement interesting. The new work in question is an 'Idyll' for B flat clarinet and pianoforte by Ralph Greaves (Oxford University Press). The composer has some obvious qualifications for the task. He writes effectively, and he appeals to most tastes. The twenty odd bars of open fifths on the same pattern would stamp him as a bold modern. But in the body of the work can be found a little tune:



and then, of course, we know that (for all that parade of fifths) the heart, so to speak, is in the right place. B. V.

Occasional Notes

The case for Tonic Sol-fa has probably never been better put than by Dr. Whittaker in the January and April issues of Music and Letters. The first contained the case; in the second appeared replies by Mr. Stanley Whybrow and Dr. Yorke Trotter, followed by a rejoinder from Dr. Whittaker, wherein he took the twenty-five main points of his opponents, and answered them with a completeness that appears to leave nothing further to be said. We thought the January article was first-rate, but on the whole we now feel that the most convincing argument for Tonic Sol-fa is to be found in the attacks of Messrs. Whybrow and Yorke Trotter, and Dr. Whittaker's detailed reply. The Tonic Sol-fa Association ought to reprint, in pamphlet form, the whole of the matter verbatim. Our experience in class-work, ear-tests, and sight-reading has been similar to that of Dr. Whittaker's. With few exceptions the best and most reliable singers have been sol-faists. We have heard parties of elementary school-children, all sol-faists, deal readily with ear-tests that would leave the average adult staffist guessing. And as for sight-reading, the rank and file staffist is out of the hunt. For example, we recently had occasion to test some dozens of adults. In all but a handful of cases, the staffists turned the test into a guessing competition. They generally knew when the tune went up or down (though not always); but as to how far it went . . .

The standard reached by the sol-faists was immeasurably better. Even their mistakes were superior, because they were errors in reading, whereas the staffists mistakes were obviously bad 'shots.' Dr. Whittaker ends his telling reply by asking to be given all the tonic sol-faists; he is quite content to leave Dr. Yorke Trotter the remainder. And our own use of tonic sol-fa—less comprehensive than Dr. Whittaker's, but covering a good many years of choral work of all sorts—leads us to say the same. We should like to see every singer become a dual notationist; until that consummation, give us, for choice, sol-faists all the time.

A correspondent sends us a protest against the following paragraph in a contemporary concerning the general education of cathedral choirboys:

> A cathedral chorister sings from three to four hours a day, thus leaving little time for his scholastic education. This is one of the most serious drawbacks to the life of a chorister; sufficient time cannot be given to general education, so that at the age of fourteen a chorister's scholastic knowledge is considerably below the standard attained by a school-boy of the same age.

We agree with our correspondent that this statement is inaccurate. The particulars we receive from time to time of scholarships at the Universities won by boys at choir-schools are all the proof we need of the excellence of the all-round educational work done at such schools. There is much, too, in our correspondent's view that the considerable amount of time spent on music helps a boy indirectly with his other studies. In a general way, of two boys otherwise equal in ability we should back the boy whose training included plenty of music. And the writer of the paragraph touches on one great merit of these schools when, after detailing some of the numerous amenities of the choir-school, he ends by saying that 'the well-disciplined life gives a boy an inestimable advantage over those less fortunately placed.' This seems to us to be a good offset to a shortage of scholastic knowledge, if there were such shortage—which there isn't.

Apropos of choirboys we take this opportunity of supporting the appeal of Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson for more cordial co-operation between choirmasters and scout-masters (see his letter on page 443). It is often said that a scout has so many calls on his time that he cannot be a choirboy as well, and we are well aware that the interests of the troop and the choir sometimes run counter to one another. Nevertheless, there is much in Mr. Nicholson's view that, generally speaking, the best scouts make the best choirboys, and vice versâ; and this being so it is short-sighted policy for choirmasters to run the risk of losing a good deal of first-rate material. Surely it is a matter of arrangement. We know of parishes where very successful scout troops are largely made up of choirboys. This is because choirmaster and scout-master have laid their heads together and arranged (1) for the minimum of clashing of fixtures, and (2) that on the rare occasions when such clashing occurs, the scouts who are also choristers must put their choir work first, or, alternatively, abide by the decision of the choirmaster as to what boys can be given leave of absence from choir-work for the occasion. Moreover, it has to be remembered that the scout troop is a very potent attraction—generally rather more so than the choir. The maintenance of a large boy choir is already sufficiently difficult; choirmasters should not lightly take up an attitude that will certainly add to the difficulty. On the other hand, scout-masters who are disposed to refuse admission to choirboys may be reminded that a sprinkling of musicians is a great asset to a troop when competitions, entertainments, camp concerts, and en route singing and whistling are required. Above all these more or less selfish considerations, however, is the fact that both choir and troop have a very important part to play in the development of boy life. Every effort should be made to give as many boys as possible the benefits of both.

The tercentenary of Orlando Gibbons's death (June 5) is to be fittingly observed by celebrations at Oxford, Cambridge, York Minster, Canterbury, Hereford, and Bristol Cathedrals, Newcastle (Bach Choir), and Edinburgh (Madrigal Society). London will do its part with special services at St. Paul's Cathedral and the Chapel Royal, and a concert of anthems and madrigals at Æolian Hall by the Oriana Choir, at which Gibbons's instrumental music will also have a place, the performers being Mr. Bernard Ord at a harpsichord and an orchestra led by Mr. Charles Woodhouse. All these events take place on June 5. On June 3 Miss Margaret Glyn will play some of Gibbons's keyboard music at a recital at Æolian Hall (3.15). We understand that a committee has been formed with a view to the celebration of Gibbons on the lines of the recent Byrd commemoration. All who wish for advice or assistance in arranging performances in connection with the tercentenary should write to the Committee, at the British Music Society's Offices, 3, Berners Street, W.1.

There should be no complaints on the score of lack of novelty at the Three Choirs Festival (September 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11, at Gloucester). No fewer than ten new works are down for production, among them being a Symphony by Sibelius, an unaccompanied Motet by Holst, five choral songs for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Walford Davies, an eight-part unaccompanied Motet by Charles Wood, and orchestral items by Lyon, Howells, Dunhill, McEwen, &c. It is worthy of note that twenty of the composers represented are British, and local pride is no doubt felt in the fact that of these nine are Gloucestershire men. The inclusion of three anthems of Orlando Gibbons (presumably in recognition of the tercentenary of his death) inspires a hope that at some future Festival due honour will be paid to the Elizabethans as a body. We are glad to see Stanford and Parry represented by two of their finest and most neglected choral works—'Stabat Mater' and 'Job.'

Very attractive, too, is the scheme of the Leeds Triennial Festival (October 7-10). The choral works include the B minor Mass, Mozart's Requiem, Palestrina's Motet, 'Assumpta est Maria,' Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' Charles Wood's 'Dirge for Two Veterans,' Bax's 'This Worlde's Joie' and 'Mater ora filium,' and Holst's new 'Choral' Symphony. The Symphonies are Beethoven's ninth, Tchaikovsky's fifth, and Brahms's fourth. The orchestra will be the London Symphony, there is a strong list of soloists, and Sir Hugh Allen and Mr. Albert Coates will conduct.

This Note is for readers who have for charitable disposal old musical instruments, especially of the stringed type, and copies of simple chamber music. Such things are urgently needed by a large native school in Uganda, for the training of a few chamber music parties with a view to forming an orchestra later. There is great interest in music—and, indeed, in all kinds of learning, as is shown by the fact that the Ugandans have collected £27,000 for the building of new schools. Good professional teaching is available, so the abundant musical enthusiasm is sure of good direction. Readers willing to help in any way should write to Miss Mary M. Paget, 20, Clarendon Road, London, W.11.

'The Town of the Ford,' a pageant play by W. Graham Robertson, with music by Thomas F. Dunhill, is to be performed at the Theatre Royal, Guildford, for two weeks commencing on Monday, May 18. The play deals with history and legend connected with Guildford and the district, and music forms a very important part of the production. Considerable use has been made of Surrey folk-tunes. There will be a large cast of principals, a choir of about two hundred, and a full professional orchestra. The conductor will be Capt. Claud Powell, whose successful enterprise in Guildford musical life is well known.

A BEETHOVEN NUMBER

The March issue of Die Musik will rank with the pre-war special Beethoven numbers of this periodical. Theodor Frimmel's essay on 'Beethoven und Schubert' deals with the interview between the two composers in 1822, and the question whether they met again or not. The writer then proceeds to consider the influence of Beethoven's music on that of Schubert.

Walter Engelsmann writes on the law of sonata form as he sees it manifested in Beethoven's works. His conclusion, which he supports by adducing many examples, is :

> Every one of Beethoven's Sonatas is, in all its movements, sections, and themes, evolved from one chief theme (Kopfthema) or motive.

Max Unger provides a thorough examination of Beethoven's handwriting and spelling. He expresses the opinion that many faulty readings in the published editions of Beethoven's letters might have been avoided.

Walther Nohl considers Anton Schindler's relations with Beethoven in the light of the evidence provided by the Conversation-Books. There is also an article by William Peterson-Berger on 'Beethoven Viewed from the Roman Horizon.' And a great number of new books or reprinted older books on Beethoven are reviewed.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S DIARIES

In the Neue Musik Zeitung (March), Oskar von Riesemann summarises Tchaikovsky's diaries for the years 1873-91, recently published in Russia :

> There is nothing in them that will cast light upon certain obscure events in the composer's life. A good many of the composer's judgments are one-sided, unintelligible, or even warped. Yet, as a whole, the diaries are interesting and instructive.

Among the excerpts quoted are the following :

> I hate the works of Beethoven's last period, and especially the Quartets. They contain flashes of light, but nothing more. The rest is the chaos over which the spirit of this musical Zebaoth hovers. . . Of Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Gluck, all I have to say is that who knows Mozart knows all the good that lurks in these four. Mozart, the greatest of all creative artists, did not grudge taking them under his wing and thus rescuing them from oblivion. They are but beams which have been absorbed in the radiance of the sun, Mozart.

MOZART ON MUSICAL CRITICISM

In the Nouvelle Revue Musicale (February), the following excerpts from a letter which Mozart wrote to his father in 1782 are quoted :

> I should like to write a little book on musical criticism, with examples. . . . Composers, in order to enjoy success, must write either music so easily intelligible that any cabman could hum it, or so unintelligible that their vogue is due to the fact that no rational human being can see anything in them.

A FRENCH CRITIC ON THE 'ALPINE' SYMPHONY

In Le Ménestrel (March), Jean Chantavoine writes :

> This work reminds me of the methodically adapted scenery which you encounter in Germany, with sign-posts such as : '5 Min. Rabengrund, romantische Gegend (Achtung, Stufen !) : 10 Min. Zur Nornenwiese (Durchgang verboten) : 15 Min. Hohenzollernturm (9.999 m. üb. M.) mit Orientierungstafel (Aufzug : 50 pf.), Restauration Hexenlust, Fremdenzimmer, vorzügliche Küche, prima Weine, civile Preise.'

STRAVINSKY'S 'OBJECTIVITY'

In the Revue Pleyel (March), Ernest Ansermet writes :

> From the days of Beethoven we have grown so accustomed to consider music as a 'means of expression,' that nowadays most people think that music begins to exist only when its language is subjective. In order to realise what the objective action of music is, we must simplify and considerably reform our attitude towards music. Listen to the first seven bars of the Overture to 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' or to one of Schubert's modulations : you will experience a certain state of sensitiveness, which is created solely by the perception of a certain musical quality—and this is the musical fact. A musical work consists of a sequence of musical facts. If its author displays nothing but the movements of his musical imagination in reaction upon a certain form, the organization of the musical facts in the work will be of purely musical, objective order. If his imagination moves in response to a certain psychic state of his, it is an extra-musical logic that will govern the succession of musical facts ; and the work will appear subjective.

After pointing out that in objective music originality is more needful than in subjective examples, 'because a musical fact, after being expressed once, has no further value except as a means of expression,' the author concludes :

> Simplifying his devices, expanding his forms, Stravinsky has achieved absolute independence, and liberated music from extra-musical aid. He has finally conquered pure music ; he inaugurates an era of new classicism. The full significance of his output is only dawning upon us. His advent is one of the great events that played a part in altering and renovating music.

CRITICISMS OF 'CARMEN' FIFTY YEARS AGO

In the Courrier Musical (March), Ch. Tenroc quotes a few of the things written about 'Carmen' in 1875, by leading Parisian critics :

> 'Bizet sought nourishment in the enharmonic dainties dear to the "musicians of the future"—a diet fit to blight the soul and starve the heart. There is neither plan nor unity of style in "Carmen."' Thus Oscar Comettant. Paul de Saint Victor wrote : 'Bizet belongs to the new set whose ideal is to dismember musical ideas instead of inscribing them within a definite contour.' Pierre Véron described Bizet as 'gone astray in the wake of Wagnerism.'

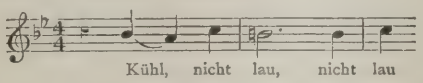
BACHIANA

In the Zeitschrift für Musik (March), Dr. Alfred Heuss seeks to ascertain whether the song 'Willst du dein Herz mir Schenken,' which appears in Anna Magdalena Bach's 'Noten Buch' (1725) under the title 'Aria di Giovannini,' is not by J. S. Bach. He sees Bach's imprint in much of the music. His conclusion is :

> I consider that only Bach would have written it. So long as no relevant evidence, external and internal, crops up to show that it is by another composer, we have no right to exclude it from Bach's output. And even should this evidence unexpectedly crop up, the song would lose none of its artistic value. It is a small thing, but altogether worthy of Bach.

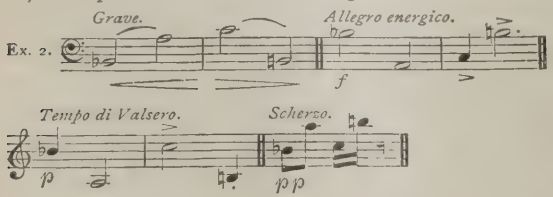
In the same issue, Paul Mies gives a long list of compositions on the theme B A C H. He mentions works of twenty-two different composers, including Beethoven (Canon to Kuhlau) :

Ex. 1.



and incidentally refers to one Dubitzky, who, he tells us, is responsible for the following :

Ex. 2.



OPERA IN SOVIET RUSSIA

In the same issue an editorial note says :

> After various experiments—such as the suppression of conductors—comes a time when all 'bourgeois' and 'monarchical' opera-texts are being revised. Glinka's 'A Life for the Tsar' is now being called 'For Scythe and Hammer.' The plot of Puccini's 'Tosca' is made to take place in the days of the French Revolution, and its title is now 'The Fight for the Commune.' In 'Cavalleria Rusticana' it is not a peasant, but a bourgeois, whom Alfio kills. Revised versions of the main works of Verdi, Donizetti, Rossini, Meyerbeer, and others, are in the making.

MUSICAL RUSSIA TO-DAY

The March issue of the Musikblätter des Anbruch is a special Russian number, the planning and carrying out of which was entrusted, with excellent results, to Prof. Victor Belaiev. Not only all the principal Russian composers of to-day, but the conditions of music, musical education, science, history, and criticism in Russia are dealt with by writers such as L. Sabaneiev, Igor Gliebov, V. Yakovlev, N. Zhilaiev, and others. It is a document which no student of contemporary Russian music can afford to ignore.

Among the younger composers, those whose work interests Russian circles most, apart from Stravinsky and Prokofiev, are Miaskovsky, Feinberg, Alexandrov, and Roslavets, about whom we know very little so far. Increasing importance is ascribed to the music of S. Taneiev (1856-1915) ; and there is no sign that the Scriabin cult is waning.

An article by N. Zhilaiev, 'Which European Music interests Russia?' does not altogether live up to its title. In the article on the musical writers of Leningrad, one is struck by the fact that Prof. Findeisen's name is omitted.

THE GENUINE 'BORIS GODOUNOV'

This issue contains an article on 'Boris Godounov' by Dr. Wellesz, whom the fact that the original vocal score of this work is now re-issued in the Universal Edition has enabled to compare the two versions. Dr. Wellesz is as emphatic in his protests against Rimsky-Korsakov's alterations of Moussorgsky's masterpiece as d'Alheim, Robert Godet, Carraud, and many others were who previously compared both editions. I regret that he should give credence to the legend that 'only two or three copies of the original "Boris Godounov" reached Paris.' I can certify that this is not the case. Numerous critics owned—and still own—copies of it, and many music-lovers had purchased copies (sometimes in considerable numbers) in view of private performances of excerpts at a time when there appeared to be no hope of the work being produced at Paris. Thus it is only fair to admit that the widespread protests against the Rimsky-Korsakov arrangement came from people who knew what they were talking about. The legend which Dr. Wellesz accepts—and which originated, I think, in the United States—might tend to convey the opposite impression.

ON VIOLINISTS AND VIOLINS

The editorship of Le Monde Musical has changed hands. The new editor, M. Marc Pincherle, is a well-known specialist in the history of bow instruments and their repertory. What we are to expect from him is more than foreshadowed in an article of his (February issue) on Czecho-Slovakian violinists, and in a miscellaneous column which provides informative and other tit-bits on Ysaye, Heifetz, Toscha Seidl, a violin used by Mozart, and the endless rivalry between violins modern and ancient.

A 17TH CENTURY MELODRAMA

In the Rivista Musicale Italiana, Vittorio Ricci writes on a hitherto forgotten melodrama of the middle of the 17th century, 'Celio,' the music of which is by Niccolo Sapiti and Baccio Baglioni :

> The manuscript is in the Public Library at Florence. The work appears to have been produced in 1646. Why no mention of it is made in available records is not clear. The music shows traces of the influence of Peri and Caccini. The recitatives are well designed, and very melodic in character.

DARIUS MILHAUD

In La Revue Musicale (March) is an essay by Boris de Schloezer on Darius Milhaud. Although he formulates a few restrictions with regard to certain of the composer's ventures, de Schloezer does not hesitate to declare that :

> Milhaud is, after Stravinsky, the most richly endowed and most powerful of musicians of our times. He belongs to the race of great creators.

A complete catalogue of Milhaud's output, published and unpublished, is appended.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN FOLK-MUSIC

Also in the March issue is an article by Charles Lavin on Araucanian national music. The same author writes on the traditional music of Latin America in Le Guide du Concert (February-March).

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

I must thank readers in various parts of the world for some interesting and appreciative letters. It is pleasant to find that these Notes are read and followed so far afield. I see that recent comparisons between the standard of records issued in this country and abroad—especially in the United States—are borne out by my correspondents. To a reader at Canton (Ohio) I have to say that I cannot deal here with the constructional side of the gramophone, partly because space is barely sufficient for the reviewing of all the records worthy of notice, and even more because of a rooted objection to mechanism of any kind. His diagrams have left me giddy, and I can only suggest that a letter to Capt. Barnett, at the office of The Gramophone, will be likely to produce the information required. A Port Elizabeth reader asks for the source of the Handel-Elgar Overture so finely recorded recently by H.M.V. The work exists in various shapes, owing to Handel's habit of borrowing from himself, and arranging movements in many ways. In the form used by Elgar, the Overture appears as the introduction to the Chandos Anthem 'In the Lord put I my trust,' a work which seems to be practically unknown in England, and apparently printed only in the German Handel Society edition.

Last month's Notes having been held over, I have a double dose to review, and must therefore confine my remarks to the outstanding records.

COLUMBIA

Among the March issues I found the records of Saint-Saëns's 'Carnival of Animals' unexpectedly attractive. I knew the work in a pianoforte-duet version, which (even after making allowance for the inevitable loss of effect) did not favourably dispose me towards it. The scoring makes all the difference, however. There is real humour in the Suite, though it will not be to everybody's liking. And most probably gramophonists will regard it as rather a costly joke, and would prefer a more substantial work for their guinea. Playing (under Hamilton Harty) and recording are good (three 12-in. d.-s.).

Mr. Harty is busy to better purpose in the next work to be reviewed—Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins (Arthur Catterall and John S. Bridge). This is a first-rate effort on the part of all concerned, and my only complaint is that in one or two passages of the slow movement there is a suggestion of hurrying. The work is on five sides, the sixth being filled by Spohr's Duet for two violins unaccompanied—a piece suggestive rather of Haydn than of the Spohr whose chromaticisms are now so démodé. It is quite a jolly, though unoriginal work. Its warm reception at a recent London concert makes one wonder if we are in for a revival of a handful of Spohr's best things. There can be little doubt that he has been shelved too sweepingly; so first-rate a musician and string-player could hardly have written so much without hitting the bullseye a fair number of times.

Another excellent violin record is that of Albert Sammons playing the well-known Chaconne of Vitali (12-in.). The Lento from Franck's Quintet has full justice done to its wistful beauty by the Lêner String Quartet, with Olga Loeser-Lebert at the pianoforte (12-in. d.-s.).

Among the March vocal records I mention only the 12-in. of Norman Allin singing 'I'm a Roamer,' and 'The Lord worketh wonders' ('Judas Maccabæus'). This is a curiously unequal record. The Mendelssohn song is capital in every way, but in the Handel air the florid passages are far from clear. I was only vaguely conscious of what was wrong until I slowed down the record. Mr. Allin is so well able to sing rapid divisions with perfect clarity that his failure here is the more remarkable.

The April list is full of good things. If I do not regard the records of Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration' as the pick, it is probably because of some antipathy to the work itself. But most people rank it high, and to them the records will be a boon. Strauss's scoring is of a type that tries the gramophone very severely, but on the whole the recording is clear. The players are the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra (their first appearance in the recording room), conducted by Bruno Walter. (Three 12-in. d.-s., the sixth side containing a delightful reproduction of the 'Dance of Sprites' from Berlioz's 'Damnation of Faust.') More to my taste than the Straussian death-bed is Bach's Concerto No. 1, in D minor, for pianoforte and strings, played by Harriet Cohen and conducted by Sir Henry Wood (three 12-in.). The pianoforte tone is good, and the whole performance crisp and rhythmical. A stimulating record of a type that is a stand-by. How Casals plays the familiar 'Kol Nidrei,' in the Bruch version, needs no telling (12-in.). William Murdoch is recorded playing a couple of melodious trifles—Debussy's 'Arabesque,' in E, and the well-worn Melody in F of Rubinstein. Little did I expect to find the 'Melody' the more satisfactory of the two; but so it was. Either Mr. Murdoch or the machine missed something of the grace of the 'Arabesque' (10-in.).

Among the best of the vocal records are the 12-in. giving six Elizabethan love-songs (Dowland, Campion, R. Jones, J. Attey, and Bartlett), sung by Dora Labbette, with string quartet accompaniment arranged by Frederick Keel; and a 12-in. of Norman Allin in a couple of extracts from 'Parsifal.'

H. M. V.

The March output contained a notably good reproduction of Stravinsky's 'Fire Bird' Suite, conducted by Albert Coates. Stravinsky's scoring is of the type that comes out remarkably well, as was shown by the 'Petrouchka' records. These are no less successful (two 12-in.).

First-rate pianoforte records are those of Paderewski in a couple of Chopin Mazurkas (10-in.), and Lamond in the 'Waldstein' Sonata (three 12-in.). Paderewski's tone is on the twangy side, but the freedom and fancy of his treatment of the Mazurkas more than make amends. It is good to have the 'Waldstein' complete. Lamond takes the Rondo with a deliberation that surprises one, but which justifies itself as the movement goes on. The sixth side of the third record is filled by the Scherzo from the Sonata in E flat, played with delightful crispness. Here is a good set of lessons for the aspiring pianist! Excellent string records are a 10-in. of Isolde Menges playing an Allegro of Fiocco and Joachim's arrangement of Schumann's 'Abendlied'; and a 10-in. of Cedric Sharp in a tuneful Sarabande and Allemande by Senaillé. Among the other good things in the March list, I enjoyed very much a 10-in. record of Liam Walsh playing the Irish bagpipe—'The Blackbird,' and the reel, 'Salamanca.' The result is very clear, and not a bit noisy. The bagpipe viâ the gramophone makes an unexpectedly good drawing-room instrument.

The April parcel brought what many of us have long wanted—a record of Kreisler in a big work. For a long while he has done little beyond fiddling away at trifles. Here he is heard in Mozart's Concerto in D, No. 4, conducted by Sir Landon Ronald. The whole record is a pure delight. I don't know how far the cadenzas are Mozart's; hitherto I have been as rabidly anti-cadenza as anybody, but the beautiful finish and delicacy of these convert me (for the time being). Now that Kreisler has done his gifts justice, let us have no backsliding! (four 12-in.).

Sir Landon Ronald conducts in another Concerto—Mendelssohn's G minor, for the pianoforte, with Moiseiwitsch as soloist. This is a happy choice of pianist. Moiseiwitsch's slick style is exactly suited to this facile music. It is all glitteringly clear, and skims the surface of things in an engaging manner. There are many better concertos I have enjoyed less than this once popular, but now unfashionable, work (three 12-in.).

The pick of the vocal records is, I think, that of Chaliapin in an unaccompanied Russian folk-song, 'Crazy-headed John,' and Rachmaninov's 'The moon is high in the sky.' The mezza-voce singing in the first is wonderful (12-in.).

The De Reszke Singers are heard in two of Vaughan Williams's best folk-song arrangements—'Bushes and Briars' and 'The Winter is gone' (10-in.). This is better than their previous records, but surely it is too strenuous for the style of the pieces. The tenor tone is pressed and reedy in the louder passages, and the words are not clear. I have yet to hear any male-voice quartet singing to equal that of the Kedroff Quartet. Here is a matter in which the Russians can teach us something.

The set of records (four 12-in.) of the Church of England Morning Service and Evening Canticles are intended, we are told, 'both for the use of people who are remote from Churches, and as a model for village and other church choirs without a musical foundation.' I can imagine their being welcome in the former connection, but I sincerely hope they will not be taken as a model by village choirs. We are gradually getting away from the artificiality of monotoning, and it is a pity that these records, with the prestige attaching to St. George's Chapel and the name of the officiant, Dr. E. H. Fellowes, should come along and emphasise that feature. The chanting of the Canticles and Psalms is just average Anglican, much less free than it ought to be. The voices are good, of course. But why do the singers commit such an elementary fault as breaking the phrase in the final response? ('And take not Thy Holy Spirit ∨ from us.') This is not a good model for village choirs! There is a good deal in this idea of church service records; I believe many devout invalids will find them a boon. But for teaching purposes we want something less stilted and conventional. There is room for a good set exemplifying some of the suggestions of the Archbishops' Committee on Church Music.

VOCALION

Note that in future the records formerly issued as 'Æolian-Vocalion' will be known simply as 'Vocalion,' the Vocalion Company having absorbed the Æolian interests.

I must start my review of the last two months' output with a special word of praise, first, for the excellence of the surface; second, for the marked improvement in the reproduction of pianoforte tone. As a batch, these Vocalion records strike me as being the best I have heard in regard to the latter point.

In the March parcel the choice specimens were a 10-in. of Sapellnikov playing his own Polka-Miniature,' Op. 6, No. 2, and the Glinka-Balakirev 'L'Alouette'; a 12-in. of John Coates in two widely contrasted songs—Ford's 'Since first I saw your face' and Elgar's 'Speak, music' (the latter is finely sung, but Ford's song is too much pulled about for my liking); a 10-in. of Olga Haley, Schubert's 'Die Forelle' and 'Fauré's 'Après un Rêve'; the Spencer Dyke String Quartet, in Dvorák's 'Nigger' Quartet (three 12-in., admirable as a whole, but here and there suffering perhaps from over-emphatic soloing of themes); a set of three 12-in. giving a capital performance of Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, conducted by Stanley Chapple; and an enjoyable violoncello record—pieces by Sammartini and Marais, played by Howard Bliss (10-in.).

The April Bulletin is in the form of a booklet instead of the former irritating and inconvenient, long, multi-folded slip. Sapellnikov is again to the fore with an unusually good record — Liszt's 'Waldesrauschen' (No. 1 of Two Concert Studies) and his own Valse in E flat (12-in.).

The Spencer Dyke Quartet gives us Haydn's Quartet in D, Op. 64, No. 5 (generally known as 'The Hornpipe'). This is quite first-rate in every way—one of the very best of chamber music records.

By the time arrangers have finished with them, Rossini will hardly know those pieces of his that make up 'La Boutique Fantasque.' First the label was Rossini-Respighi; now it is Rossini-Respighi-Godfrey, Sir Dan having recast the Suite for military band. Of course it loses something, but less than one would expect. Here, as played by the Life Guards Band under Lieut. Eldridge, it makes a jolly affair (12-in.).

Two string records are to be noted: Albert Sammons and Ethel Hobday are responsible for an admirable performance of Handel's Sonata in A, well-balanced and excellently reproduced (12-in.); Howard Bliss seems less well suited in a couple of Saint-Saëns items than in his March pieces; moreover, his intonation is not always first-rate (12-in. d.-s.).

John Coates sings Vaughan Williams's 'Linden Lea,' and the old song 'The Pretty Creature'—overpointing the latter, surely (10-in.). I don't feel the gramophone has yet given us Coates at his best. Nor has the wireless, for that matter. There is something in this fine artist that belongs to the platform, and seems to stay there.

No; we have not yet done with those Volga boatmen. Here is yet one more record of their song, made by Rosing. I am not quite sure that the introduction of the balalaika into the orchestral accompaniment was a happy thought. One sees the point; but instead of giving local colour, the instrument is likely to suggest some of the large tribe of trivial plucked instruments. We may even imagine one of the boatmen dropping his oar for a guitar or banjo. On the other side Rosing is heard in a Volga Lullaby—rather overloud for dormitive purposes, I feel (12-in.).

Two such fine voices as those of Frank Titterton and Malcolm McEachern should not be squandered on futilities like Bonheur's 'The Battle Eve' and John Parry's 'Flow gently, Deva!' (12-in.).

The banjo still has its votaries. To such I commend a 10-in. of Alfred Cammeyer in a couple of his own pieces—'Marche en passant' and 'Danse Bizarre.' They are astonishing examples of what this humble instrument can do when handled by a virtuoso.

NATIONAL GRAMOPHONIC SOCIETY

I am glad to report further activity on the part of this Society. The membership increases steadily, and there can be no doubt that we have here a powerful body of enthusiasts who will influence for good the output of the companies. The Society's second set of records is even better than the first. The Schubert Pianoforte Quartet and Schönberg Sextet, 'Verklärte Nacht,' are works for which we might have waited some years but for this enterprising Society. They are admirably performed by the Spencer Dyke party, and the recording is excellent, the surface (as in the first set issued) being as nearly silent as any on the market. Harold Craxton is the pianist in the Schubert. The pianoforte tone is above the average, but there is not always quite enough of it. This is the only fault in the balance. The Schönberg, with its complex score, is a big test from which the players and recorders come out with flying colours. The two works fill eight 12-in. d.-s., and readers who wonder whether joining the Society is worth while should have their doubts solved on hearing that these fine records of hitherto unrecorded music are to be had by members at five shillings each. The Hon. Secretary, eager to answer inquiries, is at 58, Frith Street, W.1.

Player-Piano Notes*

BY 'STRETTO'

I must ask readers carefully to note that for reasons of space and general convenience, my criticisms will be largely implied by selection, but I trust that a comparison of my writings with the makers' bulletins will not exhibit the power of the 'sup-press' too harshly.

* A.C. = Æolian Co., Ltd.; A.S. = Sir Herbert Marshall & Sons, Ltd.; S. & P. = S. & P. Music Roll Co., Ltd.

With a further view to the convenience of readers, I propose to classify rolls under the general headings of 'Classical,' 'Popular,' 'Songs,' and 'Dance Music.' I hasten to add that this is in no sense an arbitrary division. Between the first two groups the line of demarcation will at one time be very definite, and at another it may fade insensibly away. Many pieces might quite properly appear under both heads, and to others neither description will exactly apply. With this proviso in mind I hope, however, that the headings will provide a general idea of the type of music under discussion.

CLASSICAL

The first roll which strikes my eye is undoubtedly 'classical,' and yet it is probably the most popular of all Bach's organ works. It is the Toccata and Fugue in D minor, arranged for pianoforte by Tausig, and recorded for the 'Duo-Art' pianoforte by Friedman (A.C. 6732). The playing is brilliant, though the time is rather 'sticky' in places—the rhythm is unnecessarily interrupted. The music itself is intensely dramatic, and provides an effective answer to those who think that all fugues are 'dry.' The arrangement is good, though it displays the limitations of two hands as against two hands and feet in a way that makes one long for the arrangement direct from the organ score of all Bach's big organ works. Mendelssohn provides an effective comparison to this work in his Prelude and Fugue in E minor (A.C. 0217), played by Adela Verne. It is a perfect example of the composer's melodramatic style, but is a thoroughly enjoyable work, though the pianist, to my mind, drags out the quiet ending unduly after the fine climax of the Chorale. Irene Scharrer gives us a hand-played version of Chopin's Etude, Op. 25, No. 6, in G sharp minor. It is an exquisite pattern in sound, and is perfectly played, with some wonderful touches of rubato. Indeed, it is an object-lesson in this respect alone. It is, however, difficult to play; care must be taken to shade off the ascending passages in the right hand, and it must all be played very delicately. John Ireland provides an authoritative reading of his own 'Ragamuffin' (A.C. A765), a vigorous bit of modernism that has a real cockney swagger about it, especially in the saucy little tune near the end. Lamond plays Liszt's Etude in D flat (A.C. A757) magnificently. It is a richly-wrought piece, and a fine example of the composer's pianistic style. The left-hand arpeggios, however, call for much dynamic variation, otherwise they become monotonous. It is exceedingly effective, and provides material for much study. I must warn readers not to suppose that Brahms's Ballade, Op. 10, No. 1, in D minor (A.C. T24612), is anything like Chopin's pieces of the same name. It is issued as an ordinary roll, and is very Brahmsian in style, and rather austere. A liking for it grows on one, I think; but this really is 'classical'! I don't think I like Liszt's Ballade in D flat (A.S. 88904). It doesn't seem to say much, and is inclined to be vulgar. On the other hand, the Bach 'Italian Concerto' (A.S. 92512/3) is fine 'open-air' music, healthy and vigorous. The last movement is especially jolly, and calls for the rhythm to be well marked. Just emphasise the obvious beat of it with the pedals. Schumann's 'Papillons' (A.S. 89413) is in the same style as his 'Carnaval,' though of course not so mature. It seems rather scrappy, but parts of it are delightful. The same composer's Arabesque, Op. 18 (A.S. 89014), is charming, but constructionally weak; repetition takes the place of development. The Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 1, in B flat minor, of Chopin, calls for no special mention, except a comment on what a hard nut it is for the player to crack. The notes are easy, but tone-control and interpretation are quite the reverse.

POPULAR

I should think that Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Espagnole' (A.C. 6208) contains more paper and more rubbish than any other 'Duo-Art' roll this month. I should not have mentioned it, except that it might be thought I had overlooked an important work. Medtner's 'Arabesque,' Op. 7, No. 1, in E minor (A.C. 0218), is a curious piece, yet very pleasing. Irene Scharrer plays it beautifully. Rubinstein's Barcarolle in A minor (A.C. A749) is an effective piece of high-class salon music. It is very full and pianistic, and is impeccably played by Hofmann. Two rolls of some importance are a selection from 'La Boutique Fantasque,' by Rossini, arranged by a modern Italian, Respighi (A.C. T24619/20). There is congestion of notes in places, which gives a 'playery' effect, but they contain much varied and charming music, demanding careful playing. Small pieces claiming 'honourable mention' are: 'Volkslied,' by Mark Hambourg (A.C. T24591), and 'Petite Valse,' by Pouishnov (A.C. T24563). Both these provide much scope for the restrained use of rubato.

I am including most of the S. & P. hand-played rolls under this heading, because, although some of them are classical, they are mostly popular in the best sense. Liszt's 'Benediction of God in Solitude' (S. & P. 6009) is the composer at his best, and is a finely wrought expression of religious emotion. Laurence Dennison plays it superbly. Two numbers from Granados's 'Escenas Poeticas' (S. & P. 6006) display the hand-played roll at its best. The performer is Felice Silver, who plays them with distinction, and brings out some beautiful little harmonic touches. The same pianist plays Balfour Gardiner's 'Five Pieces' (S. & P. 6008). Already well-known, they are especially pleasing in this version. The 'Children's Overture,' by Roger Quilter (S. & P. 6004/5), is a delightful little Fantasia on nursery tunes. The orchestral colour is missing, of course, but young and old will enjoy them equally. They should certainly be noted. Two very good Chopin rolls follow—Valse, Op. 70, No. 2, in F minor (S. & P. 6011), and Prelude, Op. 45, in C minor (S. & P. 6000), the latter the solitary late one which many consider the finest of all the Preludes. The smaller pieces which may be recommended are: 'Hexentanz,' by MacDowell (S. & P. 6010), with a really appropriate title; Rosenthal's 'Les Papillons' (S. & P. 6007), which flutters most delightfully; and two small salon pieces by Arensky—'Consolation' (S. & P. 6003) and 'Élégie,' in G minor (S. & P. 6002), both played by Trevor Hansen. I must also mention the low price of all these rolls.

SONGS

I congratulate the Æolian Company on producing two real songs, as distinct from mere ballads. They are: 'Now sleeps the crimson petal' (A.C. 26462), by Roger Quilter, and 'The lass with the delicate air' (A.C. 26464), by Arne. In both good verse is beautifully wedded to good music.

DANCE MUSIC

The Æolian rolls are well up to standard this month, and include most of the popular successes; and I must find a line in which to mention the new S. & P. 'Echo Super-Rhythmic' rolls. The makers claim that if played slowly they are a Blues, when played moderately fast they are a Fox-trot, and played very fast they make a One-step. Not being an expert dancer I cannot confirm this, but from a musical point of view the rhythm is remarkably good, and presents a subtle superiority over that of many dance rolls that I cannot quite analyse, but which is certainly there. The 'amplifications' are well restrained. The price is very low.

Wireless Notes

BY 'CALIBAN'

Much of the recent storm of criticism directed at the B.B.C. was ill-considered and unfair. To read some of the letters one would imagine that the complainants had paid ten pounds a year for their licence, instead of a mere ten shillings and sixpence (if they paid at all). As usual, most of the grousing in regard to music came from the queer people who yell 'highbrow' whenever an item happens to be other than a fox-trot or a royalty ballad. They want all the programmes to suit their own undeveloped tastes, whereas those of us who have brows of a height that is generally held to indicate at least normal intelligence, don't in the least grudge the lowbrows an occasional orgie of tripe.

The B.B.C. has the biggest entertainment problem that was ever set, and on the whole it is meeting the situation more successfully than one would gather from the recent attacks. It will do even better when it entirely gives up the idea of trying to please all the people all the time. This can't be done, and even if it were possible, it shouldn't be done, because there are folk whose tastes should not be catered for. They have to be saved from themselves, as drunkards and drug victims have to be. For example: it has long been a grievance of those who enjoy good music that the B.B.C. mixes up its programmes in such a way that a musician has to keep switching on and off in order to hear what he wants. The Company has improved in this respect, but there is still a good deal of hodge-podge, whereas there ought to be none at all. I am quite ready to leave my set unused for an evening or two while the ballad, fox-trot, and musical comedy enthusiasts have their fill. Give me a couple or three good programmes a week, and I consider myself well served. I have, however, cause for complaint when good and bad are mixed up, and the time-table goes wrong as well. Thus, I switched on recently at the scheduled time in order to hear a certain musical item. Instead, I found myself in the toils of a duologue of the most banal description.

This was the kind of thing:

'Where were you at ten o'clock last night?'
'Where was I at ten o'clock last night?'
'Yes.'
'You want to know where I was at ten o'clock last night, do you?'

And so on, with much of the same subtle badinage concerning the stealing of a rabbit. Now, if there are people of so low a type of intelligence as to find pleasure in backchat of this feeble sort, it is no part of the duty of a great organization like the B.B.C. to serve it up.

Let me work off one or two further grievances. When the time-table goes awry, and something has to be sacrificed, why is it always the best music that comes under the axe? For example, in a programme of songs and chamber music, the singers are always allowed full fling, and the chamber music is cut, if necessary. Two bad cases come to mind. On one occasion John Coates, in giving a couple of groups of songs, was allowed so much rope in the way of introductory remarks (none too fluently delivered) that the instrumental work next down on the programme was omitted. On another evening we were promised the Delius String Quartet, but it was broken off near the end of the first or second movement (I forget which), and was even guillotined on an unresolved discord!

Again; there is a good deal of dissatisfaction among London musicians over the fact that some of the provincial programmes—Newcastle, for example—are on the whole far better than those of London, and that whereas the best London programmes are usually sent out to the provincial stations, London is rarely allowed to enjoy the excellent provincial schemes. In other words, heads they win, tails we lose. Yet again: Seeing how many neglected masterpieces there are waiting for justice, we cannot but feel sore that the B.B.C. should have gone to the vast trouble and cost of giving the first English performance of so poor a work as Stillman Kelley's 'Pilgrim's Progress.'

Moreover, choral music is the least satisfactory type of music for broadcasting, and it therefore seems a pity to lavish money on it. For example, at the recent 'Messiah' performance broadcast from Manchester, the only satisfactory items were the solos, which came through remarkably well.

However, despite these grumbles, we have to thank the B.B.C. for many delightful evenings, from symphony concerts to such programmes of intimate character as those of the Kutcher Quartet, and other chamber music parties, and (one of the very best) some lovely old music sung by Dorothy Silk.

The Evening Standard programme, stunt though it may have been, was a great success. The Kedroff Quartet must have been a revelation and education to many in the art of male-voice quartet singing. As for Tetrazzini, let me own that for the time being I became a prima donna 'fan.' Her singing was delightful, and incidentally showed that Galli-Curci is merely an agile flute beside Tetrazzini, with her great command of colour and expression. But Madame should not attempt to sing in English. Chuckling over her quaint efforts, one felt that even so must foreigners be amused when listening to the polyglot programmes of certain English singers.

Our March issue contained a report of a performance by the Newcastle Bach Choir, in which we stated that the size and proportions of the Choir were forty-eight, with twelve voices to a part. We learn that this is hardly correct. Forty-eight names appear in the programme, but only forty members sing at the concerts, each part dropping automatically the two members least regular at rehearsals. Choral societies generally might well adopt this method of keeping up the attendance average, and of ensuring that the performers are practically certain of being those who know the work best.

Church and Organ Music

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

Two lectures on Choir-Training will be given at the College, on Tuesday, May 12—at 2.30 p.m., by Mr. G. Thalben-Ball, subject, 'The Choir in Church,' with illustrations by the choir-boys of the Temple Church; at 6.30 p.m., by Mr. Hubert S. Middleton, M.A., Mus.B., subject, 'Country Choirs and Congregations, with special reference to the Training of Voices, and a General Knowledge of Church Music.' Admittance free. No tickets required.

F.R.C.O. (CHM.); A.R.C.O. (CHM.).

The Examinations for the above Diplomas will be held at the College on Wednesday and Thursday, May 13 and 14.

PERFORMANCES OF BACH'S PASSION MUSIC

A few years ago 'The Messiah' was sung at so many churches during Lent and Eastertide that we had to give up the attempt to chronicle the performances. Much the same state of things now obtains in regard to the Passions of Bach; both have been sung, either wholly or in part, at numerous churches in London and the provinces. It is impossible for us to include all the reports correspondents have kindly sent us. To print a few would be invidious, and a list would be bald and uninteresting. We can therefore do no more than mention the great increase in the number of performances, and express our admiration of the enthusiastic hard work of the organists and choirmasters who are thus giving their congregations opportunities for becoming familiar with the Bach Passions.

An unusual recital was recently given at Oldham Parish Church, the organ soloist being Ronald Stansfield, a fifteen-year-old member of the choir, assisted by two of his fellow trebles—Frank Taylor, who played a violin solo (Gluck's Largo in G) and Willie Harley, who sang 'He shall feed His flock.' The organ items comprised Mendelssohn's second Sonata, Parry's Prelude on 'Rockingham,' Bach's 'Little' Prelude and Fugue in E minor and the Prelude on 'Ich ruf zu Dir,' the Menuet from the 'Suite Gothique,' and the 'War March of the Priests'—the last-named being Ronald's own choice, we surmise. The giving of a programme by these youngsters was appropriate, for the collection was in aid of the Choirboys' Fund.

The annual Festival Service of the Southwark Diocesan Plainsong Association will take place at Southwark Cathedral on May 7 and 8. The service book may be had from the secretary, Mr. Godfrey Sceats, 18, Ballina Street, S.E.23. It contains a simple and effective fa-burden for the canticle tones by Mr. E. T. Cook, and the anthem is Tye's 'Laudate nomen,' to which familiar English words have been adapted. The Easter Sequence is included, but not, we are sorry to see, in the 'English Hymnal' version. This is now so well known that it seems a pity to confuse choirs and congregation with an occasional use of a form in which the translation is different and the melody not quite the same.

The Chesham Oratorio Choir, now in its second season, gave a concert on March 19, with a good miscellaneous programme which included Spohr's 'God, Thou art great,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' choruses by Handel, Mendelssohn, and Martin, and miscellaneous items contributed by an excellent array of soloists—Lady Maude Dawson, Miss Ethel Fenton, and Miss Faith Hoper. There was a small string orchestra. Mr. R. B. Green conducted.

The organ at St. John's, Southwick Crescent, W., has been reconstructed by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper. The re-opening took place on April 2, when Sir Walford Davies gave a recital, playing Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor and E flat Sonata, Schumann's Fugue No. 1 on B A C H, and Chorale Preludes by Parry and Walford Davies. At the end of the dedication service, Mr. Norman Greenwood, organist of the Church, played the Reubke Fugue.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was sung at Richmond (Yorks) Parish Church on March 31, by the combined forces of the Church Choir and the Richmondshire Choral Society. The soloists were Miss Edna Hodgson and Mr. George Parker, Mr. W. A. Crosse played the drums, Mr. Herbert Bardgett the organ, and Mr. Arthur Fountain conducted. A congregation of about a thousand attended this, the first performance of the work at Richmond.

At a musical service held at St. John the Evangelist, Upper Norwood, on April 1, the choir sang Mendelssohn's 'Christus' and Motets by Mozart and Gounod; Mr. W. H. Bellamy sang two of Dvorák's 'Biblical Songs,' and the boys of the choir Bach's 'My heart ever faithful.' The Rev. G. Sydenham Holmes, priest-organist, conducted, and played Mendelssohn's sixth Sonata and Bairstow's Scherzo.

The annual Choir Festival of Clapton Wesleyan Church took place on March 22 and 23. On the former day, anthems by Wilbye, S. S. Wesley, Parry, and Sullivan were sung. At the secular concert the chief items were Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' a group of songs by Cornelius, a Suite for pianoforte duet by Markham Lee, and part-songs. Mr. Wallace J. Madge, the organist, conducted.

A new organ—a three-manual of twenty-three stops—has been erected in Stricklandgate (Kendal) Wesleyan Methodist Church by Messrs. Blackett & Howden, of Newcastle. The instrument was dedicated on March 19, when a recital was given by Mr. Paul Rochard, who played a Handel Concerto, Widor's fifth Symphony, Bonnet's Variations, &c.

From the Benfleet Weekly Gazette we learn that the organ in St. Mary's, South Benfleet, is to be enlarged and renovated through the generosity of Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson. A fund had been raised for the purpose, but on the suggestion of Mr. Nicholson it will be used instead for building a west gallery for the accommodation of the enlarged instrument.

A special musical service was held at Jackson's Lane Wesleyan Church, Highgate, on March 22. The choral works included Walford Davies's 'Five Sayings of Jesus' and 'Magdalen at Michael's Gate,' and excerpts from Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater.' Mr. Eric Brough played Franck's Chorals Nos. 1 and 2, and Chorale Preludes by Bach.

Mr. John Langford has retired from the chairmanship of the Nonconformist Choir Union, a position he has filled with conspicuous ability for ten years. Appreciation of his services was shown in the presentation of a handsome arm-chair. His successor is Mr. Leonard C. F. Robson.

Letters to the Editor

A COLLECTION OF ALTERNATIVE TUNES

SIR,—Many organists have at different times composed alternative tunes to well-known and popular hymns. These form useful and pleasing variations from the usual settings in the numerous hymn-books, irrespective of denomination. Without replacing the older tunes, which have come to be in a sense classics of their kind, these new tunes are useful in keeping alive the interest of both choir and congregation. The same thing applies to chants for Psalms, and the special canticles such as the Te Deum and the Benedicite.

I want if possible to bring out a supplemental tune-book to include the best of these, and shall be very glad to receive any good tunes or chants that are in use in churches and chapels throughout the country. Such a collection at a reasonable price would be appreciatively received—I hope very widely—and I shall be greatly obliged for assistance in this connection. Payment will be made in the event of publication.—Yours, &c.;

CHANT SETTINGS OF THE TE DEUM

SIR,—There are not a few who, having to deal with a village service, where vocal talent is restricted, and the organ not always what it should be, find that in course of time the selection of Chants in the 'Cathedral Psalter' is rather limited. Those set for the Te Deum are a case in point, and organists whose knowledge of worship-music does not extend far beyond the Psalter mentioned and the 'Cathedral Prayer Book' (in many respects a more satisfactory compilation) do not always seem able to make a suitable selection by way of novelty. This leads them to indulge sometimes in the composition of weird four-fold chants which are anything but in the true spirit of ecclesiology.

Strictly speaking, the Te Deum should never be doubled—it should be sung to single chants or to a special setting. Even when a double chant is used it is best to change to a single one for vv. 7, 8, and 9, thus avoiding that awkward and most unmusical repetition of the second half.

Some time ago I was discussing the question of congregational singing with Sir Walford Davies, and he told me he had made effective use, especially with a large body of voices in unison, of the Tonus Peregrinus—that familiar piece of plainchant invariably used for the Psalm 'In exitu Israel.' As plainchant it is of the late period, and, as students will know, the short phrase in the 'Cathedral Psalter' is only part of an anthem—almost the earliest example of a tone-poem—which will be found in its entirety in the revised edition of Helmore made by Briggs and Stainer. Some phrases of this may be judiciously extracted by a musician of ideas and taste, and used to eke out the short phrase usually met with in Psalters.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, the Abbey organist, a true Church musician, in a talk I had with him on the same subject, pointed out the use of descant (a counter-melody over the main theme) in the folk-song manner; and he has written a special setting which is particularly effective. It was sung, I think, at the Abbey at the time of the Peace Celebrations; and whenever a Solemn Te Deum is called for it may be used to good purpose. The idea may be used with a chant setting by a good musician; and it may be carried out in the accompaniment only, if the chant be sung in unison.

For those who want a new selection of Te Deum chants, I can recommend the following as suitable and effective. If single chants are used, take three which will be found in the alternative chants for the Venite, viz., Russell in C, Cooke in F, and Ouseley in C. Another set is Arnold in F, Stainer in C, and Reinagle in F.

Those who like the double chant may try Garrett in G (among the Benedictus chants). In common with that by Barnby, the unisonal nature of the two principal phrases, makes it particularly suitable. A change should be made to a single chant (as previously mentioned) for vv. 7, 8, and 9, taking for the purpose such an one as, e.g., Battishill, which will be found among the Magnificat chants. Then change to Crotch in C (13th Morning), and for the last four verses take Turle in F (8th Evening).

Another set is Barnby in E (among the Benedictus chants), substituting Foster, in the same key, for vv. 7, 8, and 9. A change may be made to Jackson in A (8th Evening), and a return to Barnby or Foster for the finish.

The Benedictus chants are also somewhat limited, and the following will provide fresh material. Bentinck (18th Morning), Barnby in D (same day), Barnby (29th Morning), Turle (23rd Morning), and Fitzherbert (24th Evening).

There yet remains the glorious setting by St. Ambrose, which in its dignity and rugged simplicity remains the ideal setting of the great Hymn which is daily sung to the glory of God. A study should be made of it; and it will lead perhaps to the use of more plainsong, which, after all, is the true music for the Liturgy, and one which fits in with the ceremonial with peculiar fitness.—Yours, &c.,

WAKELING DRY.

NOTATION OF THE HORN: SOME ALTERED MEANINGS

SIR,—Mr. Blandford displays a positive talent for evading the point at issue. He drags false scents across the trail in a way that would make a respectable red-herring turn pale with envy. And this even with quite minor points. For instance, Mr. Pegge gave us to understand that he followed the apparently up-to-date Parisian practice of fully stopping every 'bouché' note. As undoubtedly many composers have intended these notes to be only half closed, I suggested that the habit was slovenly. I repeat that it is so—as slovenly as playing every passage forte whether it be marked p or f. Mr. Blandford objects to my venturing to criticise Mr. Pegge's 'playing, which I have never heard,' and vaguely imputes it to my 'contempt for practical experience.' A false scent! I said nothing whatever about Mr. Pegge's playing. For aught I know, he may play like an angel, fully stopped notes and all. But this is no excuse for an inartistic habit! As for my 'contempt for practical experience,' which I have neither expressed nor felt, I suppose it is merely a florid way of saying that I unfortunately do not always agree with Mr. Blandford.

'Mr. Wotton will have none of Richter,' cries your correspondent. Another false scent! Mr. Wotton will have none of the so-called evidence adduced by Mr. Blandford to prove that Wagner was such an egregious ass that he wrote deliberately what he did not mean. Whether Wagner's ideas were practical—and I myself have suggested that probably he had his doubts as to this—or whether the + had better be taken to imply a simple 'bouché,' as Mr. Blandford prefers, or whether it should invariably connote the 'cuivré' tang, as seems the practice of some, are different questions.

Mr. Blandford doubts whether stark anzublasen is the precise equivalent of cuivrer. I would suggest that it is possible that the modern Parisian idea of the latter may not be precisely that of Berlioz and Wagner. In any case, the tone is intended to imitate that of the trompe de chasse, and the first time Wagner marks stark is against the horns on the stage in 'Tristan,' obviously meant to represent trompes.

The choicest and most highly perfumed false scent is reserved for my main theme. I doubt if anyone, reading the correspondence, would gather the subject of discussion. Mr. Pegge at least is candid! He admits at the commencement of his first letter that he fails to see my point, and then proceeds to fill two columns arguing what he is unable to perceive. Yet surely my theme was a simple one? I pointed out that, as regards 'bouché,' 'cuivré,' and the sign +, composers and writers were not in accord in their definitions and meanings. While A suggested that 'bouché,' implied the use of the mute, B insisted that it did not; if C gave one signification to the +, D gave another, and E a third; 'cuivré' was said by F to be one thing, only to be contradicted by G. The result is, that on meeting one of the three indications in an unknown score it is sometimes difficult to be sure what the composer means.

I expressed no opinion as to the various meanings. I merely catalogued facts. And those facts are not disturbed by asserting that A made a 'blunder,' or that B had not 'addressed his mind' to some particular aspect, or that C was 'kind.' If the facts be correct—and they can be verified—there does not seem much to argue or even discuss. But Messrs. Pegge and Blandford appear to have rushed into the fray without realising this! As players on the instrument, they were filled with holy horror at any non-player daring to breathe the sacred name of Horn, and determined to crush the impious one. But, as there was nothing to crush, they had to expend their fiery energy on irrelevant matters. I trust that that energy has burnt itself out, for I am rather tired of trying to head your correspondents off these false scents.—Yours, &c.,

TOM S. WOTTON.

SIR,—In his letter in the March issue of the Musical Times, Mr. Wotton stigmatises as 'slovenly' the practice of fully stopping all notes marked 'bouché.' The same would, no doubt, apply to a person who, when asked to 'cook' an egg, boiled it. Let me assure your correspondent that if composers will say what they want, their wishes will be carried out even by one so slovenly as myself!

In the absence of explicit instructions such as '½-bouché,' or 'voilé' (employed by Charpentier), I fail entirely to see what the poor horn-player is to do, except fully stop such 'bouché' notes as he meets. To discuss the various means at the disposal of the horn-player for producing what is known as the stopped tone is beyond the scope of a letter, and it is to be hoped that the able pen of Mr. Blandford will soon furnish us with a paper dealing exhaustively with the question.

However, by way of giving Mr. Wotton a hint as to the complexity of the problem, I may say that d'Indy's F, which he requires half-stopped (Ex. 3 in Mr. Wotton's article), would, if the F crook is used as directed, have to be played ¾-stopped to get the note in tune. It must not be thought that half-stopping necessarily lowers the pitch half a tone. It is on such points that an article from the pen of an expert, such as Mr. Blandford, would clear away a number of misconceptions which give rise to uncertainty in the minds of composers as to how to mark the parts in order to obtain a given result.

Charpentier's direction 'voilé' is much sounder than d'Indy's, inasmuch as he gives the player clearly to understand the effect he wants, but wisely leaves him the choice of means by which he gets it. The wisdom of such a course is doubly evident when it is realised that to get the so-called half-stopped notes in tune, they may require anything from one-quarter to four-fifths stopping, according to the degree of the scale. 'Though Shen-fi has but one gate, many roads lead to it.'

I will even go so far as to express doubt whether Mr. Wotton, comfortably ensconced in a fauteuil at Queen's Hall, with the score on his knee, could tell exactly what method the player was using to get his stopped and 'voilé' notes. He would, of course, know if they 'sounded right,' but if they did not, surely the onus is on the conductor, who, presumably, rehearsed the work? After all, it is the conductor who is le grand manitout at an orchestral concert, and the horn-player's interpretation must, in a properly disciplined band, be subordinate to the former's directions, which one may expect to be based on tradition, personal directions from the composer, or the dictates of the conductor's own artistic conscience.

I must apologise for not having written sooner, but illness in my family, coupled with other circumstances beyond my control, rendered it impossible for me to attend to the question earlier.—Yours, &c., J. MORLEY PEGGE.

THE REGENT'S BUGLE

SIR,—Early in the last century an instrument was brought out in this country under the name of the 'Regent's Bugle,' which appears to have passed unnoticed by all English writers on musical instruments, at least in recent times. It is, however, mentioned by Dr. Curt Sachs, whom very little escapes, in his 'Real-Lexicon der Musikinstrumente' (Berlin, 1913, p. 319b), in a few lines that may be translated as follows:

> 'REGENT'S BUGLE: According to Joh. Gg. Schmidt a slide-bugle (Zug-Flügelhorn) constructed by Percival, London, in 1815, the notes of which could be lowered in pitch by from one to five semitones.'

A bugle, the pitch of which could be so lowered by a slide as to give only one position less than that of the trombone, would be a remarkable structure, well worthy of a niche in the archives of obsolete instruments. Indeed, it is hard to say in what material respect it could have differed from a trombone. It is nevertheless probable that the Regent's Bugle was no more than a short model of slide-trumpet, of which I have come across two examples, without having ever seen it described, figured, or exhibited.

One of these instruments was in 1895 in the possession of a Whitby resident, and of this I took complete notes. It once belonged to the 'Whitby Pink Band,' and, together with the other band instruments, including a horn which I described in this journal (August, 1922, p. 546), was seized for debt and remained for many years hung up in a lawyer's office, until most of its companions perished of decay or were eaten of worms. The other instrument belonged in succession to the two famous trumpeters, the Harpers, father and son, and was included in the sale by auction of the latter's effects in 1896.

Both these instruments are really slide-trumpets in which the body-tubing is bent on itself twice, just as in the modern cavalry duty-trumpet, which has the effect of reducing the length of the body to about 12½-in., or about that of a cornet. The two sections of cylindrical tubing which are united by the bend nearest the player are arranged to form a slide precisely as in the standard slide-trumpet, except that the spring-box, placed in the farther bend, is single, and the slide can be extended for a length of only 3½-in. in the Whitby and 2½-in. in the Harper instrument.

The Whitby trumpet is (or was, if it no longer exists) of brass, simply and cheaply made, without any decoration, and measures, without the mouthpiece, 68½-in. in length. It had no crooks when I saw it, but they might have been lost. No doubt its highest pitch was intended to be F, the slide being therefore too short to lower the pitch by even two semitones, so that a chromatic or even diatonic scale could be produced only in the upper register. The mouthpiece is original, and has a deep conical cup, not angulated at its junction with the throat, and quite unsuitable for brilliancy, giving a smooth horn or cornet-like tone. The instrument is inscribed 'Clementi & Co., London,' and 'W. P. B., 1838,' and is reputed to have been used by the leader of the band.

On the other hand, the Harper trumpet is a very gorgeous affair, made, crooks and all, of solid silver, parcel-gilt, with the ornamental ferrules and embossed rim usually found on the best old trumpets. It bears the hall-mark of 1819-20, and was made by James Power, of 34, Strand, London, but the spring-box is stamped 'Kent.' It possesses the usual bits, shanks, and crooks for all keys from F to D inclusive, and C, but not the original mouthpiece, no doubt also in silver, for which another has been substituted.

One can hardly class either of these instruments as anything but a true trumpet, although in each case the conical enlargement to form the bell is on rather more generous lines than in the accepted trumpet models, and the Harper example has lost, even with a trumpet mouthpiece, a trifle of its brilliance and incisiveness. The Whitby mouthpiece, at all events, shows that brilliance was not aimed at for that particular instrument.

It is worthy of notice that three names, Percival, Power, and Clementi, are associated, as constructors, with the Regent's Bugle and these trumpets. Assuming that the instruments are the same, it looks as if this short model, which would be much more manageable in a band on the march than the long and badly-balanced standard slide-trumpet, had enjoyed a fleeting measure of popularity, in spite of the competition of the key-bugle and, in due course, of the cornet, which was to supplant the lot. Percival and Power appear to be otherwise unknown as instrument makers; the latter was probably a silversmith only.

Although the Regent's Bugle must have played a very small part in music and contributed little or nothing to its development, it would be of some interest to students of instrumental history to identify it accurately. Imperfectly as these two trumpets answer to the description of Joh. Gg. Schmidt, whoever he was, I cannot help thinking that they are surviving representatives of this forgotten bugle. Can anyone who is better informed on the subject carry it a stage further?—Yours, &c., W. F. H. BLANDFORD.

GRAMOPHONE RECORDS: ENGLISH AND FOREIGN CATALOGUES

SIR,—Apropos of Mr. Sorabji's letter in the April Musical Times, I also am an ardent and enthusiastic gramophonist, and as such I venture to disagree in part with his views concerning foreign gramophone catalogues. The French Gramophone Company's catalogue is to my mind very good indeed, inasmuch as it provides some really excellent examples of the national music unobtainable in England. But while agreeing that the German Gramophone Company's catalogue is excellent, I think the English catalogue is easily eclipsed by that issued by the Victor (H.M.V.) Company, of Camden, New Jersey, U.S.A. May I add that I have at hand the Danish, Norwegian (Sin Herres Stemme), and the Swedish (Husbondene Röst) catalogues of the Gramophone Company, and I consider these to contain some really splendid matter, especially Scandinavian Lieder.—Yours, &c.,

CHOIRBOYS AND SCOUTS

SIR,—I wish to appeal to those of your readers who are choirmasters to encourage their choirboys to become boy-scouts. In many places a certain amount of friction has unfortunately been allowed to rise between the scout movement and church choirs; so that we hear of regrettable cases where choirmasters refuse to take boys if they are scouts, and scoutmasters discourage their boys from belonging to choirs. This is all wrong, and where such antagonism has been allowed to arise it ought always to be removable by frank discussion, and by both parties realising how much they have to gain by co-operation.

The scout-master can help the choirmaster by sending to him musical boys who come under his influence, and by instilling into them 'scout ideals' of discipline, obedience, power of observation, unselfishness, and general smartness, which are as essential to the good chorister as to the good scout, but which the average choirmaster has perhaps little opportunity to develop.

The choirmaster can help the scout-master by sending him boys of just the type required, who are to some extent specialists in music, and who could do much to raise the standard of musical attainment of the troop: and if the choirmaster could also give some practical help in the troop music, this would often be most welcome.

The advantage of such co-operation is obvious; for it is not too much to say that the efficient scout (given a voice) is potentially the ideal chorister; and the efficient chorister (in character and not only on musical grounds) is potentially the ideal scout.

A serious effort is being made to organize music amongst the scouts on sound lines: the possibilities would be greatly increased by a large influx of choirboys, whose presence would raise the standard of what could be attempted. Could music become an important part of the activity of every scout troop, not only would immediate practical results follow, but a love of good music would be developed among this vast society of boys to whom the nation must look not only for the performers but also for the audiences of a few years hence.

As a practical step it it suggested that wherever possible one or more patrols in each troop should be composed of definitely musical boys (especially choirboys), for whom special arrangements could be made and whose main 'scout job' would be to work for the music of their troop. It is hoped before long to arrange a competitive musical festival in London for scouts, and as there will be classes designed to test all degrees and kinds of talent, it is hoped that many chorister-scouts will be forthcoming as competitors.

Meanwhile choirmasters and scout-masters are urged to get together and talk over difficulties, and try to arrange a satisfactory scheme of working, so that full advantage may be taken of the benefits to be derived from close co-operation.—Yours, &c., SYDNEY H. NICHOLSON

GRAMOPHONE RECORDS

SIR,—Now that the gramophone companies are giving us 'uncut' records of the great classic writers, I would humbly suggest that they turn their attention to the recording of some of J. S. Bach's choral music.

We can now procure fine records, played by great performers, of some of his instrumental works, but I do not know at present of any records of his choral music. I know what a delight such records would be (witness the result of the records of the Elizabethan Masters) to those who, like myself, live in the wilds, and get no opportunity for hearing Bach's choral works performed in a concert-hall. I do not speak selfishly. I only reiterate the remarks of many lovers of Bach's music who are in the same predicament as myself.—Yours, &c., COUNTRY DOCTOR.

Seascale, Cumberland.

WORDS TO INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC

SIR,—At a recent concert for children the first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony was played, and words were given to the audience for them to sing to the first subject, 'What a tune, heavenly tune, made by Mozart.' At the usual speed of that movement they would become 'Wotta tune, hevly tune, ma' by Mozart.' One of the listeners told me that she recognised it later, but changed a little and the words did not quite fit, so that all she could think of was, 'What a tune, heavenly tune, made by Mo'!

At the same concert another young enthusiast told me the words given for Howells's 'Puck's Minuet.' I asked for the tune, only to be told 'I can't remember the tune!' This, although the piece was played twice.

I asked a well-known lecturer and writer to explain the object of this union of spur-of-the-moment doggerel with fine orchestral melody, and all I got for my pains was 'Oh, you're too high-brow!' coupled with the information that he himself used the following words for the second subject in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, 'Do you see the lovely creature?' A lovely creature to be for ever associated with that great melody of sunlight and hilltops!

What is the use of it all? The children would enjoy singing to la, and would notice the tune all the better for the lack of words. It is the wrong place for them, though there is nothing more valuable for developing rhythmic sense in small beginners, in their own music-making efforts on a keyboard.

When they have acquired the skill and knowledge to play Bach Fugues or Beethoven Sonatas, words are only in the way.—Yours, &c., NANCY GILFORD.

'THE TRUTH ABOUT GERHARDT'

SIR,—I was surprised to read in Mr. Kaikhosru Sorabji's letter that the 'distinguished authority,' Mr. Herman Klein, had been pitching into Gerhardt for her lack of vocal technique. While I entirely agree with Mr. Sorabji about Gerhardt's misdemeanours, I think he has made a mistake in quoting Mr. Herman Klein as the particular 'distinguished authority,' for I distinctly remember reading in a previous issue of a periodical that Mr. Klein went into raptures with Mr. Ernest Newman about the esteemed lady. So I should like to know who is the 'distinguished authority'?—Yours, &c., K. M.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The end of the Lent term at the Royal Academy has proved an exceptionally busy time, and almost every day for a fortnight entertainments of more than usual interest have taken place. The quantity and varied nature of the performances compel a restricted notice, although in quite a number of instances the quality is deserving of a more extended criticism.

On March 20 and 21 the dramatic students, under the direction of Mr. Acton Bond, presented a triple bill, incidental music being provided by the Junior Orchestra conducted by Mr. Spencer Dyke. Congratulations are due to all concerned in the production of these three pieces, and if the subtle satire and mock serious atmosphere of Lord Dunsany's 'The Golden Doom' was at times inclined to flag, yet it is no easy task for young students to depict ancient and bearded Babylonians. A real Grand Guignol shocker, 'The Hut above the Tarn,' by Nevin Halys, replete with murders and other horrors, was as enthusiastically acted as it was appreciated by the audience.

On March 23, what was modestly described as a dress rehearsal of 'The Magic Flute' was given by the opera class conducted by Mr. Julius Harrison. This performance was a prelude to an infinitely more ambitious venture due to take place in July at the Scala Theatre, where there will be a complete week of opera, the works chosen being 'The Magic Flute' and Verdi's 'Falstaff.' This 'repetition general' was a great success, a notable feature of the evening being the excellent ensemble attained, and the singing of the two trios of ladies was most impressive. A South African soprano, Miss Rose Alper, was vocally and dramatically both satisfactory and satisfying in the part of Pamina. It is a pity, bearing in mind the general condition of opera in England, that the Academy cannot immediately realise its ambition of a modernly equipped theatre, for it is already provided with a remarkably efficient nursery, and in Mr. Julius Harrison an admirable head-nurse.

Queen's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, March 31, was a cheerful and inspiriting sight, the occasion being the students' orchestral concert under the conductorship of Sir Henry Wood. The orchestra numbered a hundred and twenty-five performers, and it may perhaps be said without undue exaggeration that the performance of Brahms's 'Academic Festival' Overture was by way of being a revelation. Sir Henry resigned his baton to Miss Kathleen Summers, and she conducted the Scherzo movement of Beethoven's seventh Symphony with real artistic ability. This young lady knew the score intimately, and so was able to devote her whole attention to her forces, with results that were notably and unusually good. Moreover her gestures, when she deemed these necessary, were graceful and to the point. Mr. Hugo Rignold, a violinist from Canada, gave evidence of much promise by his performance of the first movement of the Tchaikovsky Concerto, and the orchestral accompaniments were played with distinction. There was a good deal of insight in Mr. Eric Brough's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, and he is technically well equipped.

The operatic ballet class made an excellent beginning on April 2 when, after eighteen lessons under the direction of Miss Fairbairn, the members danced, mimed, and sang much to their own and teacher's credit.

An outstanding feature of the students' chamber concert on April 3 was a remarkable performance of Ravel's String Quartet in F major. This curiously difficult composition is frequently played at concerts, but rarely with such delicately beautiful effect as by Messrs. Jean Pougnet, Hugo Rignold, Harry Berly, and John Cameron. The third movement was atmospherically charming. Very enjoyable was a pianoforte recital by Mr. York Bowen in the Duke's Hall on April 1, and it was of much interest to hear the composer play his own Sonata in F minor, Op 72, amongst other items in a programme distinguished for its variety.

This gala fortnight concluded on Saturday, April 4, appropriately enough with a fine performance of Bach's 'Passion according to St. Matthew,' conducted by Mr. Ernest Read. The performance was equable and earnest throughout, the choral and solo singing generally speaking being most commendable.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The last half of the College term produced some two dozen concerts, operatic dress rehearsals, and recitals; it is therefore possible to touch on a few features only of special interest.

At the orchestral concerts two new works of importance were given a first hearing, namely, a Toccata and Fugue by R. O. Morris, a skilful adaptation of a classical model to modern methods, and a Symphony by a student, H. Strickland Constable. The last-named work proved a highly attractive composition, rich in ideas and instinct with true poetical feeling.

The chamber concerts were conspicuous for fine performances of Quartets by Charles Wood, Borodin, Brahms, and Beethoven, the last composer's great A minor posthumous Quartet being chosen; and also new compositions by E. J. Moeran, a past student, and Leslie Woodgate, a present student.

The recitals were given by Miss Muriel Nixon, a gifted soprano whose presentation of songs gained in attraction by the assistance of a string quartet; Miss May Gilson; Miss Renée Sweetland (with a superb performance of Eugène Goossens's 'Kaleidoscope'); and, rather by way of novelty, a recital by a College String Quartet of works by Beethoven and Brahms and, with the assistance of harp, flute, and clarinet, the very popular Septet of Ravel.

Of operatic dress rehearsals there were several, at which were presented Gavin Gordon Brown's ingenious ballet, 'Les Noces Imaginaires,' scenes from 'Aïda' and 'Butterfly,' and Charles Wood's scene from 'Pickwick Papers.'

Of the Patrons' Fund rehearsals one, held at Birmingham, brought together a large audience of music-lovers, most of the artists and conductors appearing being residents of, or having been educated at, Birmingham.

The composers' rehearsal held in London produced five new works, of which probably the Concerto for strings (with solo for violin and viola) of Robin Milford proved the most effective.

In addition to these concerts and recitals a performance was given, with full orchestra and chorus, of Parry's 'Job,' in which Mr. Keith Falkner, a student at the College, created a deep impression by his treatment of the part of the Prophet.

The term's awards were as follows:

Charlotte Holmes Exhibition.—Equally divided between: Christobel Fullard (pianoforte) and Janet Powell (singing).

Monteath (organ); Leslie Fly (pianoforte); Marjorie A. Turner (violin); Harold Denton (singing); Dorothy Buckle (violoncello).

Special grants have been made to the following: Joyce McGlashan (singing); Dorothy Horne (singing); Flora Young (opera); Dorothy Saunders (singing).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The usual terminal students' orchestral concert given at Queen's Hall was admittedly successful. The arduous test of being called upon to play Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony was borne with a seriousness and efficiency of purpose such as well merited the success actually achieved. The soloists also reached a standard well above the average of a students' concert.

Similarly the chamber music concert given at Æolian Hall within a few days of the above-mentioned orchestral event, well demonstrated the zeal and love of the students for their art.

The examiners appointed to conduct the annual series of examinations in the Colonies, India, South America, &c., are: Edric Cundell, C. E. Ford, F. J. Gostelow, E. F. Horner, C. Egerton Lowe, Albert Mallinson, Alfred Mistowski, and G. F. Vincent. These gentlemen have a strenuous time before them in view of the wonderfully increased entry of candidates for the examinations of this College held abroad.

Prof. J. C. Bridge has now fully assumed the offices of Chairman of the College Board and Director of Studies. An interesting ceremony took place recently in the College Board Room, when presentations were made to Dr. C. W. Pearce, on behalf of the professorial and clerical staffs, as well as on behalf of the students. Dr. Pearce, on his retirement as Director of Studies, has accepted the office of a Vice-President of the College.

NATIONALITY OF JOHN DE MURIS

Much ingenious speculation has been indulged in as to the nationality of John de Muris, the great musical theorist of the 14th century. Several authorities, including Bale, Gesner, Pits, Tanner, and Hawkins, make him out an Englishman, at least 'natione Anglus,' but Nisard, Fetis, and contemporary MSS., notably the Digby MS. 190 (Oxford), as well as recent writers, like Mr. J. F. R. Stainer and Mr. Henry Davey, give him a Norman origin. Last year, Herr Walter Grossmann published at Leipsic the first book of 'Speculum Musicae,' by de Muris, from the photostat manuscript in the Bibliothèque Nationale (Latin, Y207), a veritable desideratum, inasmuch as Coussemaker reproduced only the last two books in his monumental 'Scriptores medii aevi.' Grossmann, from a careful examination, is led to the conclusion that there were two theorists of the same name, contemporaneous: one, Jean de Muris, of Paris; and the other Jean de Muris, a Norman, who studied in England, at Oxford. The latter never cites the authority of St. Thomas, but relies on that of Robert Kilderarby, who taught theology at Oxford from 1248 to 1261, and who died as Archbishop of Canterbury in 1279. De Muris was an old man in 1321. W. H. G. F.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

One came away from the Royal Choral Society's Good Friday performance of 'The Messiah' at the Albert Hall with impressions far less mixed and feelings far more exalted than usually attend visits to Kensington Gore on Saturday afternoons when that large—but not always great—choir is singing one or other of the familiar works which are the backbone of musical England. Too often, we feel, the Royal Choral Society, like a fifteen-stone forward in club 'Rugger,' relies upon mere weight to carry it through. It may be sluggish in attack, slow on the ball, but a choir with hundreds of singers will always somehow struggle to its cadences as a burly leader of the scrum will bear his way into the enemy's 'twenty-five.' The Royal Choral Society, it must be admitted, is more sensitive to leadership than might have been expected from so numerous a body, and under a conductor with personal magnetism it develops unwonted precision of line and cleanness of tone. Nevertheless, it is not in the habit of impressing one, as should a really first-rate choir, with the supreme beauty of human voices raised in concert. It is all the more pleasant, therefore, to be able to write nice things about 'The Messiah' performance under Dr. Bairstow. This was in nearly all particulars admirable. The choruses moved along with the majestic assurance which no composer has ever possessed in the same measure as Handel; the due balance between the parts was always maintained, and the dry, hard tone which the sopranos not uncommonly produce on their high A's was happily absent. Some of the choruses, such as 'Glory to God' and the 'Hallelujah,' can be sung by any number of singers, from twenty-five to ten thousand, but others, like 'And He shall purify,' are really unsuited to mass production—however much we have grown accustomed to the process—and when a large body of voices really succeeds in attaining a musical result in spite of its own inherent disabilities, the achievement is at least worthy of commendation.

This may seem grudging praise. But the fine singing of smaller choirs, the Glasgow Orpheus being perhaps the best example, does make us wish it were possible to hear 'The Messiah' performed under conditions that Handel knew. Handel has a broad brush; but his effects contain infinite finesse which no body of singers of the number of the Royal Choral Society can ever attain.

Of the soloists Mr. Norman Allin was the best. His voice is always improving in depth and colour. He never gave us a slovenly phrase, an inarticulate word. Miss Dora Labbette has the indefinable quality of charm and a clear, pure tone that in its higher register can be really thrilling. She has not a great voice, but few sopranos are more pleasant to hear. Mr. Frank Mullings was impressive, though apt to lapse into sentimentality, overdoing in particular 'Behold, and see if there is any sorrow.' Madame Clara Serena was undistinguished, hardly in the class of the other three. H. E. W.

GLASGOW ORPHEUS CHOIR

In view of our article on the Glasgow Orpheus Choir it was useful to have an opportunity, at Queen's Hall, on April 18, for verifying all the good things that can be said about it. The Choir is without doubt a practically perfect choral instrument. Each section of the voices is a unity right through, and can perform any item of expression from a calm sostenuto to a tripping delicacy; the choir's words are alive in whatever style they are singing; the voices are always in the middle of the note, and as a consequence the chording is clean; everything that the conductor asks is done with ideal responsiveness and elasticity. The tone—equalled no doubt by many choirs in the North—had its own particular pleasure for the ear. In the contraltos it was delicious. To hear them sing 'Bells, bells' over and over again in the setting of Poe was alone worth a Saturday afternoon. The women's voices in Charles Wood's 'Here a solemn fast we keep' are a memory. The secret of the choir's fascination to the ear was in part revealed by the clean, natural singing of the three soloists who stepped from the ranks to help in the programme. Probably no voice in the choir has a trace of vibrato.

The programme was almost worthy of the choir's attentions. It was well varied, and the examples of the various styles—glee, madrigal, part-song, humorous song, Scotch air—were well chosen. But—just to show how hard we are to please—what was 'Scots wha hae' doing in this precious two hours of music? An admirable tune, of course; but this was not a Burns nicht. We may congratulate Mr. Roberton on his arrangement of 'O waly waly up the bank,' and on the beautiful effect it made. What phrasing in that soprano tune! Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' was the chief number in the programme. It was sung to admiration; but, to be captious again, the quiet tenor melody was not allowed enough prominence, and the building of the climax was not rhythmically firm enough.

The B major 'Go!' at the end was well done. Among the encores was a specimen of the pleasant old Scots Psalmody that was first brought to the notice of most of us by the Glasgow Orpheus, the 'Immortal Hour' Fairy Song, and—for those that liked it—'The bonnie, bonnie banks of Loch Lomond' sung by everybody: but what an odious noise the audience made with its mezzo-soprano and baritone octaves. M.

THE BACH CHOIR

'A Lyke-wake dirge,' by Dr. W. G. Whittaker, was the storm-centre of the Bach Choir's concert at Central Hall on March 31. It is a setting for full chorus and orchestra of some Border verses that utter warnings or promises to a departed soul. Dr. Vaughan Williams conducted the first performance in London, and then gave a pre-arranged encore. The work stood the double trial well, as music. It portends wonderfully, with a force of original expression that we had not suspected in Dr. Whittaker. The fault lay in overdoing it, especially the word-by-word illustration. A typical couplet from the poem says that on the passage 'Whinny Muir'—one of the places of trial adjacent to the local Styx:

If hosen and shoon thou ne'er gavest nane,
The whinnes sall pricke thee to the bare bane;

Was it necessary to underline the threat, to rub it in, so to speak, with so much vehement orchestration and declamation? It was like one of those films that leave nothing to the imagination. At the mention of Purgatory the composer gives us an orchestral 'close-up' of the district. All these lurid details are thrown in with a fine freedom, but Dr. Whittaker seems to be forgetting all the while the suggestive power of the human voice—and this in a choral work.

The choir fully enjoyed this temporary license to let loose all its venom—between a Palestrina Mass, 'Assumpta est Maria,' and Dvorák's Te Deum.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY,
QUEEN'S HALL, APRIL 2

There are few works in the modern repertoire so difficult to appraise as Delius's 'A Mass of Life,' because there is so much to be urged on either side of the argument. But when full weight has been given to the defects, both in construction and in detail, to the unsuitable character of the text, which is of course accentuated in translation, and to the often unnecessary difficulties to be overcome in performance, the fact remains that it fills an evening with a succession of impressions that are really beautiful. It may be true that the fine frenzy of the opening is never recovered. Delius has never considered it of importance where he should place his climaxes. But climaxes need not necessarily be dynamic or quantitative, and there is a true climax of another kind in the subtle peace and silky texture of the Nocturne. It is difficult to silence the wish that Delius had more scruple for the amenities of his art. Yet on listening to this performance one felt that if he had, he would almost certainly have forfeited other and more valuable qualities. It was magnetically potent. Paul Klenau is plainly an enthusiast. No mere loyalty to the task in hand would have made certain points of the work so impressive. As for the Philharmonic Choir, the only danger is that we may come to take for granted the precision of the instrument C. Kennedy Scott has fashioned, so accustomed are we becoming to its feats of valour, of which that opening double chorus is a signal example. The soloists comprised three singers of experience—who gave no less than might be expected of them, but certainly not a pennyweight more—and a new-comer who, in comprehension of the music, outshone them completely. This was Mr. Roy Henderson, a new baritone, who sang without a score, never faltered in words or music, and seemed to make each salient line glow with life. In comparison, Miss Miriam Licette, Miss Astra Desmond, and Mr. Walter Widdop were simply exercising their best oratorio manner. E. E.

[We regret that owing to a contributor's lateness, our report of several important concerts is omitted. EDITOR.]

WIGMORE HALL, MARCH 20

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC CENTRE, APRIL 1

These two concerts were linked by the rarely included name of Bernard van Dieren, whose contributions to them claim first attention, if only because of the special prominence given to the composer by a group of musicians whose own attainments entitle them to respect. Whilst still unable to endorse the encomium passed on van Dieren in a recent volume by Cecil Gray, I cheerfully confess that the compositions heard on these two occasions have put him in a more favourable light than did some earlier performances. The songs which John Goss sang at Wigmore Hall varied so much in type that it was not easy to discern in which of them the composer was showing the most fidelity to his own ideals. But it is not likely to have been the one that was seized upon by the audience for special applause and repetition. This was a German 'Mädchenlied.' It was pleasing, as no doubt it was intended to be, but in the others, whether one liked them or not, there was a more characteristic vein of invention, sometimes acrid to the musical palate, but arresting and thoughtful. The Quartet for two violins, viola, and double-bass, performed on the later occasion, shows within the frontiers of one work the same indecision between a variety of styles, but here there can be little doubt that the movement in which the ear was least wooed, viz., the first, was the one in which the composer disclosed most the traits of his musical physiognomy. There was more beauty in the slow movement, and yet, though there was not the faintest suggestion of its being written ad captandum, it rang less true. As for the Finale, 'unbuttoned' music in the Beethovenish sense, it was infectious in its verve, but otherwise it proved the least significant section. The double-bass part, of unusual but quite legitimate difficulty, was admirably played by Eugène Cruft.

Returning to the first concert, I much regret having arrived too late to hear E. J. Moeran's 'Shropshire Lad' cycle, 'Ludlow Town,' of which many people speak highly, and though a group of Peter Warlock's songs is always one of the pleasant experiences of concert going, there is little concerning them that has not been said. As for Herbert Howells's third Sonata, which was played by Albert Sammons and William Murdoch, it is a fine work, comme il y en a tant, as agreeable to hear as doubtless it is to play, conceived in a vein of true lyrical feeling, and, in short, everything that it should be, had one not the conviction that Howells can do much better, and will do so, when he doffs some of his present urbanity.

At the Contemporary Music Centre the most completely satisfying performance was that of Philipp Jarnach's String Quintet, an extended set of variations, mostly contrapuntal, which he wrote whilst still imbibing musical wisdom from the Busoni fount. It may be less personal than some of the music he has written since, but it is also relatively free from the arid patches he has later allowed to intrude themselves. In musical beauty, the almost Bach-like Aria is easily the richest variation, though the preceding Giga has almost as much to recommend it, and the concluding Double Fugue produces the exhilaration peculiar to a dexterous exhibition of ingenuity. The hour being late I was compelled to leave after hearing the first of the two movements comprised in H. V. Jervis-Read's String Sextet, but what I heard mitigated my regrets, not that there was much to say against it. Would that there had been! It would have provided more interest. It is an amiable, if meandering, conversation about nothing in particular. The three works were played under the leadership of Charles Woodhouse, with such scruple that, at certain moments, a temporary relaxation would almost have had the effect of improving the performance. The Finale of the van Dieren would certainly have benefited, but it is not often that one hears difficult modern music played with so much consideration for the composers. E. E.

SINGERS OF THE MONTH

Mr. Alfred Piccaver sang at the Albert Hall. The Sunday concert-goers were as favourable to him as were the Covent Garden audiences last summer. This was generous, for the opera stage is his right place and, as was very natural, he did not nearly so well adapt himself to the conditions of the Albert Hall. This remarkable tenor is of English extraction, though his voice was found and trained abroad. We think he must have faced the ordeal of this concert with some trepidation, and he exerted himself with an over-anxious strenuousness.

While these efforts were well rewarded by the audience, the critic cannot allow that Mr. Piccaver's concert-singing was anything of an artistic triumph. For one thing, his idea of a concert programme was a mere miscellany of operatic excerpts and songs chosen merely as a vehicle for vocal display. It is true that that is a common idea at the Albert Hall, but it does not give a new-comer an artistic status. And again: the voice, though remarkable and powerful, is used with little subtlety, and so, however we admire it, we find that it grows monotonous.

But after all, a tenor voice of this sort is not heard every day. There can be no doubt that Mr. Piccaver has one of the best and biggest voices in Europe. And there is a certain comfort in his technical sufficiency. Up to a point he reminds one of Caruso—whose poise and stateliness of phrasing, however, he lacks. Like Caruso, Mr. Piccaver has the art of starting his phrases on a prodigious store of breath, which renders his tone richly mellow and deep-set. (It was of a too dark colour, even, at times.) But in rounding off a phrase Mr. Piccaver was frequently less than masterly. Here he was conscious of some petering-away of breath, and in trying to restore equilibrium he over-tensed and so became slightly sharp. And he slurred too much. Mr. Piccaver sang some excerpts from Wagner and Puccini and songs of Strauss and Frank Bridge. Lest my strictures look too severe, I will repeat that it is a mighty, fine, leonine voice, even though its owner does not strike me as a very sensitive artist. He gave us practically no mezza-voce.

Madame Tetrazzini a few days later sang, in the same hall, a programme of a similar order. The audience was only moderately large, and musically it must be confessed the attractions were singularly scanty. But though Madame Tetrazzini's voice is far from what it was in her prime, she possesses a technical competence which commands respect. Her easy production and elegant phrasing might be a lesson to many singers who could justifiably ridicule her musical outlook.

If Madame Tetrazzini were now to limit her feats to those of the normal lyric soprano she could still, and for long, hold a considerable place. But she has partly lost her coloratura agility, and in florid music the highest notes were hard and inclined to false intonation. Her legato is still admirable. Tetrazzini at her best would have made some of the newer adulated singers of 1925 seem clumsy. She must have worked hard in her youth.

Mr. Steuart Wilson gave another highly interesting concert, this time (Æolian Hall, March 27) wholly of the music of Ralph Vaughan Williams. The accompanists were the Snow Quartet and Mr. Anthony Bernard. Mr. Wilson began with the 'Four Hymns, with Viola,' which are dedicated to him. The accompaniment was newly arranged for pianoforte quintet. This noble music imposes brave, ringing singing, and this Mr. Wilson gave, as well as a truly intense and devout expression. Those who did not hear Mr. Wilson till later in the evening, when he grew rather tired (it was an arduous programme), would not have guessed at such potential strength. It is also true that when the demands of the music dropped from the tense and elevated to the quiet and homely, Mr. Wilson's singing, through a miscalculation of effect, also dropped—into a certain darkness and slackness. His mezza-voce was hardly interesting, because unsupported. The second group of songs was new. It contained 'Twilight People,' 'Motion and Stillness,' 'The New Ghost,' and the very delightful 'Water-Mill.' The next group (also new), 'Three Whitman Songs (on a Ground),' pleased less. The Chaucer cycle, 'Merciless Beauty,' are surely among the best of modern English songs. Then came 'Wenlock Edge,' and finally three admirable Shakespeare settings (new)—'Take, O take,' 'When icicles hang,' and 'Orpheus.'

If one appears somewhat grudging in praise of this very sympathetic and musicianly singer it is because one sees in him (given a certain improvement) a tenor of a sort rare among us and badly needed. He probably has a wider range of musical understanding than Elwes, and some of his natural gifts are better. But he falls short of Elwes in technics.

Miss Sibyl Cropper sang Schubert, Brahms, and Wolf at Wigmore Hall on March 26, accompanied by Dr. Ernest Walker. Dr. Walker played louder than most of our song-accompanists permit themselves, but his zest and understanding were admirable. The Schubert on the programme was mostly of songs of the sacred order from the less-known books, and for once in a way, Wolf, who was represented by some exquisite pieces, seemed the better man. It is true that Miss Cropper, whom we have often heard sing better, did not do Schubert justice. Too much of her singing was heavy, 'lumpish,' and uncontrolled, that afternoon. In adagio movements there was no pretence at an equable scale. Quick songs went much better, e.g., Schubert's 'Lied im Grünen' and Wolf's 'Auf einer Wanderung.' The singer's musicianship was not to be denied. But—once again—musicianly intentions do not, in a singer, take the place of the possession of a sound instrument, capable of a flexible, even scale and just in intonation.

Miss Thelma Grey sang at Wigmore Hall. She chose Holst's 'Four Mediæval Songs' (with violin), and sang them as though she appreciated their beauties. In an old French song her singing had a lively piping quality which matched the spirit of the piece. But when a serious legato was asked for there seemed to be a certain deficiency in her equipment.

MUSIC IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

We have received the programme of the musical competition held at Marlborough College. The choice of test-pieces is apparently left to competitors; if so, the list is a credit to all concerned. We see, for example, that the solo singers draw on Handel, Quilter, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Purcell, Rosseter, Grieg, Arne, and folk-song. It is worthy of note, too, that the classes include one for wood-wind instrument solo (four entries—pieces by Bach, Hamm, Schubert, and Mozart); brass solo (five entries—Schubert, Mendelssohn, Gluck, Grieg, and Gounod); and chamber music and concerted wind or stringed instruments in not less than three parts. The latter drew four entries, constituted as follows: flute, oboe, clarinet, and saxophone; two flutes, clarinet, bassoon, and horn; violin, violoncello, and pianoforte; two cornets, horn, and euphonium. What a welcome change from the days when the handful of boys studying music rarely looked farther than the pianoforte! Here the keyboard entries numbered only seven.

The chief item at the Leys School terminal concert was Holst's 'King Estmere.' The remaining numbers included Saint-Saëns's Scherzo for two pianofortes, Franck's Sonata for violin and pianoforte, Brahms's G minor Rhapsody, Carse's orchestral variations on 'Barbara Allen,' and part-songs.

At Berkhamstead School, Sullivan's 'Trial by Jury' was performed in concert version, the balance of the programme being made up by Quilter's 'Children's Overture,' Percy Fletcher's choral fantasia on 'Mignon,' and a couple of German's 'Nell Gwynn' Dances.

BIRMINGHAM BACH FESTIVAL

Beginning on Monday, April 6, and lasting for five days, a Festival of Bach music was held during Holy Week at Birmingham, under the direction of Mr. Appleby Matthews. The programme on the first day included the 'Brandenburg' Concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, with Mr. Paul Beard as soloist. Miss Dorothy Silk sang several arias, and was the soloist in the cantata, 'Glory to the King of Heaven.' The 'St. John' Passion was given the following evening. Miss Emily Broughton, Miss Alice Vaughan, Mr. Geoffrey Dams, and Mr. Karl Melene were the soloists, and the Appleby Matthews Choir and a small orchestra were heard to great advantage. The work was given in full.

A performance of the 'Goldberg' Variations, by Prof. Donald Tovey, was the principal feature of the concert on April 8. An exquisite touch and a rare musical intuition made this artist's playing one of the most memorable events of the season. The Variations were given in full, and were greatly enjoyed by a fairly large and representative audience.

Some Chorale Preludes, and the great Passacaglia, were beautifully played by Mr. G. D. Cunningham.

Dr. Tom Goodey was the soloist at the fourth concert, and sang an aria from the cantata, 'The Appearing of Æolus.' The 'Brandenburg' Concerto, No. 3, for strings, the Violin Concerto in E major, with Mr. Paul Beard as soloist, and the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, played by Miss Marjorie Wilks, were also given.

The Festival finished with a performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion, on the evening of Good Friday. Miss Emily Broughton, Miss Constance Taylor, Dr. Tom Goodey, and Mr. Keith Falkner were the soloists, and the Appleby Matthews Choir again sang the choral music.

Speaking at the end of the Thursday evening concert, Mr. Appleby Matthews stated his intention of making the Festival an annual institution, and said that next year the performances would probably extend over seven days.

Competition Festival Record

THE LONDON MUSICAL FESTIVAL

This, the twentieth anniversary of the London Festival, proved a notable success. More than 4,100 entries were received, including a hundred and eighty choirs and bands from all parts—e.g., Kilmarnock, Isle of Man, Plymouth, Portsmouth (3), Watford (4), Newbury, &c. The competitions progressed, without interruption, in three halls simultaneously, from March 16 to 28, and the four final concerts by prize-winners carried the Festival into the fourth week.

A Festival on so big a scale cannot be reported fully, so we must be content with touching on only one department. Too few Londoners are aware of the excellent performances by school and other youthful choirs that are to be heard at the London Festival. In quality and quantity this part of the programme can probably hold its own with that of any other Festival in the country. But whereas the sessions that take place at Central Hall, evening after evening, are attended by a mere handful of people, similar events at most provincial Festivals would draw packed audiences. At this year's gathering two of the young folks' events were specially striking. Eight school choirs, each about fifty strong, took down from dictation a sixteen-bar melody (by no means an easy one), and then read it at sight, only one choir failing to get through the test in capital style. As the eight also put up some excellent performances in part-singing, it will be seen that this class alone would give distinction to a day's programme at any Festival. The other noteworthy event was the Girl Guides competition, in which no fewer than thirty-one large choirs took part. Here, again, the standard achieved was very high. The recent development of choral work in the Girl Guides movement is of great importance, because it brings into the sphere of practical music-making thousands of girls who would otherwise have little chance of taking part in choral singing. So long as the vocal training is on the excellent lines shown at the London Festival there need be little fear of damage to these young voices. The results can hardly be other than beneficial.

The chief choral results are appended:

Choral Societies (not exceeding a hundred voices)—'Metrogas' (Mr. Hugh James).

Choral Societies (sixty voices)—Watford Choral Union (Mr. Wallis Bandey).

Choral Societies (forty voices)—Gypsy Club, Finchley (Mr. Leslie Woodgate).

Ladies' Choirs—1st, Mrs. Harrison's Choir, Wanstead, 175 marks; 2nd, Mr. Harry Woodward's Ladies' Choir, Plymouth, 174 marks; equal 3rd, the Manx Ladies' Choir (Mr. Noah Moore) and Miss E. K. Walter's Choir, West Norwood, each 171 marks.

Men's Choirs—1st, Kettering Gleemen (Rev. Greville Cooke). This splendid combination gained 187 marks out of 200.

Y.M.C.A. Choirs—Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Edward J. Sewell).

Church Choirs (mixed)—Queen's Road Wesleyan, Watford (Mr. Wallis Bandey).

Girls' Friendly Societies—St. Martin's Girls' F. S., Kensington (Miss Helen Cook).

Girls' Clubs—Jenny Lind Y.W.C.A. Choir (Miss Mary Bell).

Equal-Voice Choirs (Music Schools)—Sheen School of Music (Miss Edith Hays).

Equal-Voice Choirs (High Schools)—Wycombe High School (Mr. James Bates).

Girl Guides Choirs—Thirty-one entries; a spirited contest. 1st, 5th Woodford Co. (Mr. F. W. Whitford); 2nd, 13th Camberwell Co. (Miss Leaney).

Brownies—Twelve entries. 1st, 6th Lambeth Pack (Miss L. Webb).

The solo competition for a Chappell grand pianoforte attracted fifty-four entries. The test-piece was B. J. Dale's 'Night Fancies.' The coveted prize was won by Miss Julia Wolfe, East Sheen.

The gold medals for soloists were awarded to: Miss Emily Gardner, Carshalton (soprano); Miss Muriel Middleton, Rickmansworth (contralto); Mr. Maurice Milbourn, Clapham (tenor); Miss Olive Nieper, Maida Vale (pianoforte); and Mr. John Fraser, St. John's Wood (violin). The last-named also gained the British Federation of Music Industries Challenge Cup offered to the best solo performer. Two Trinity College exhibitions of nine guineas each were won by Miss Winifred Nowlan, Forest Gate, and Miss Mary Walter, West Norwood.

BOGNOR.—The West Sussex Choral Competitions claim the distinction, implied in their name, of being entirely concerned with choirs. Forty-four adult choirs and thirty-one juvenile choirs took part this year on March 26 and 27, and the whole Festival was a pronounced success. The Duchess of Norfolk, who founded the competitions in 1913, was present.

BRISTOL.—The Bristol Eisteddfod (March 26 to April 4), which has to be distinguished from the Bristol Co-operative Musical Festival of November, drew over sixteen hundred separate entries, and mustered about four thousand competitors. Only forty-one of the entries were choirs. Dancing was popular, and string playing showed an increase. Elocutionists had a day to themselves. In the chief competition, that for male-voice choirs of not less than forty voices, choirs were allowed to choose their own second test-piece, the first being 'Hereward the Wake,' by S. E. Lovatt. Bristol Harmonic (Mr. Joseph Jenkins) was better than Cardiff and District (Mr. Ted Lewis). For the smaller choirs both tests were prescribed. The W. D. & H. O. Wills Choir sang excellently, and stood well ahead of the rest in Somervell's 'Soldier, rest' and Elgar's 'The Wanderer.'

CAMBRIDGE.—The University and the County Education Committee have joined in inaugurating the Cambridgeshire Musical Festival, which was held for the first time at Cambridge Guildhall on March 26-28. The hon. secretary of the Council, Mr. C. R. Scott, was able to report that 'Last year, when the scheme was in its earliest stages, there were only five or six choral societies in the county, whereas this year over twenty have been formed and about thirty women's institutions have started choirs.' Twelve of these institutes helped to make an entry-list of fourteen in the village female-voice choir competition, and one of them, from Trumpington, carried off the prize. The successful village choirs were those of Eversden, Duxford, Lode, Grantchester, and, in open classes, Cottenham and Melbourn-Meldreth. The town competitions on the first day brought in two string quartets, one brass band, two church choirs, and three girls' clubs. The church choirs sang Tallis and Gibbons. The final day was given to the children, and at the end a choir of three hundred took part in a concert under the direction of Mr. F. C. Field Hyde. There was also a demonstration of musical training in which five hundred children took part.

CORNWALL.—The sixteenth Cornwall Music Competitions were held at Camborne from March 17 to 20. The feature of the year was solo singing, especially that of the mezzo-sopranos. Choirs were not numerous. Truro Musical Society alone sang the madrigals 'I thought that love' (Byrd) and 'In pride of May' (Weelkes), and yielded to its only opponents, Camborne Vocal Society, in Holst's 'I love my love,' Parry's 'I know my soul hath power,' and in sight-reading. Sight-reading was also added to the tests which revealed the fine training of St. Blazey Girls' Choir (Miss Richardson). Three male-voice choirs in the chief class had to read at sight in two parts. Truro People's Palace Choir showed the best faculty both in this and in the singing of the test-pieces. The prescribed music throughout the Festival was of a good order. At the conclusion combined choirs sang Bach's 'I wrestle and pray.'

COVENTRY.—This Festival opened in November, 1922, with an entry list of five hundred and seventy-five; in November, 1923, the number was four hundred; this year (April 3 and 4) it was under three hundred. The mixed-voice choir competition was not held, as the only entry, that of Coventry Choral Society, withdrew. There were only two baritone soloists, and in other classes the entry was meagre. To an outsider it might seem that the decline was due to economic conditions, but this suggestion did not appear in an admonitory leader which the Midland Daily Telegraph published on the subject. The writer asked for fuller support from the civic authorities, and recommended the city to look to its Festival.

PLYMOUTH.—The eleventh Festival (March 28-April 4) brought in fifty-eight choirs. Mr. W. F. Marsham's Mansfield Choir from Northampton was unopposed in the mixed-voice class, and won a shield for female-voice choirs. Other successful adult choirs were Tavistock Ladies' Choir (Mr. A. J. Huckle) and Plymouth Clarion Male-Voice Choir (Mr. R. J. Hands). It was the junior choirs that contributed most to the success of the Festival as a choral gathering. Both the numbers and the standard were improved. Soloists made up a great total of entries. In one event, over a hundred young pianists competed.

PONTEFRACT.—This Festival (March 24-28) was successful and not uneventful. There were twin sisters who excelled in duet-singing, a soprano prize-winner who fainted, and an eleven-year-old boy pianist who was allowed to broadcast from Leeds in the children's hour. The surprise of the Festival, to the adjudicator, was the finding of two such competent orchestras as Pontefract Permanent Orchestra (Mr. J. H. Jackson) and—two marks behind—Glasshoughton Ashton Road Evening School Orchestra (Mr. J. R. Robinson). The test was Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture. A choir of school-girls from Kippax was given ninety-eight out of a hundred marks for sight-reading. The chief successes in the choral competitions were won by Normanton Choral Union (Mr. A. H. Lawrence)—'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and McEwen's 'Weep no more' were their tests—Naburn Choral Society (Mr. H. Calvert), and Ouseburn and District (Mr. J. H. Foster). Normanton Girls' High School was given ninety-five marks, and Wakefield Girls' High School ninety-four, in Elgar's 'Lullaby.' Darrington Choral Society (Miss G. Atkinson) proved the best sight-readers. It was remarked during the Festival that Pontefract itself had not contributed as it should do to the choral side.

PORTSMOUTH.—The Welfare Association held its eighth Festival from March 18 to 21—a four-day Festival confined entirely to young people. There were busy competitions of all kinds, and an adjudicator said that he had never heard better choral singing by children. A concert programme of twenty-one items was given on April 3, when the prizes were distributed. The Duchess of Atholl was present on the third day of the competitions.

RETFORD.—The North Notts Musical Competitions, held at Retford on March 24 and 25, again did valuable work among the local village choirs and school choirs. A day of keen competition ended in combined singing, with orchestral accompaniment, Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages' and Geoffrey Shaw's 'Worship.' On the second day combined schools sang 'The Coasts of Barbary' and Holst's 'I vow to thee, my country.' The final open competitions were largely a see-saw contest between Retford Choral Society and Retford Musical Society.

WINCHESTER.—This very musical Festival was extended to five days (March 16 to 20) to make room for all the choirs that wanted to come in. The fifth day was set apart for newcomers only. The objective of each day's work is a massed concert in the evening, and to heighten the value of these concerts something good is put in for the singers themselves to enjoy. On the Tuesday, for instance, Mr. Harold Samuel played to the choirs Bach's E major Pianoforte Concerto and some 17th-century music, and the choirs sang to him Purcell's 'Soul of the World,' part of Bach's 'Sleepers, wake,' and a number of test-pieces. Bach's 'Sing to the Lord a glad new song,' with Miss Verena Carse, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. John Goss as soloists, was the chief thing in the Thursday concert, the instrumental work being Mozart's 'Symphonie Concertante' for violin and viola. The week's music also included Bach's E major Violin Concerto and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. The conductors of the Festival were Dr. Malcolm Sargent and Mr. Adrian C. Boult.

The following two-day Festivals have been successfully held: Northampton (Central Northants Musical Competitions), on March 13 and 14; Morpeth (Wansbeck Musical Competitions), on March 13 and 14; the second Mansfield Musical Festival on March 13 and 14 (successful on the children's side, but establishing itself with difficulty among the adults); Loughborough Eisteddfod, with a great entry list, on March 20 and 21; Witney and District Musical Competition Festival at Oxford, on March 24 and 25; Buckingham Musical Festival and Northallerton (Swaledale Musical Tournament), both on March 25 and 26; Hexham (Tyneside Musical Festival) and Barnard Castle (Teesdale Musical Tournament), both on March 27 and 28; Brigg (North Lincs Festival), on March 31 and April 1; and Derby (Dove and Churnet Valleys Festival), on April 1 and 2.

Among the single-day Festivals that call for mention are those held at Saltaire (Shipley and District Musical Festival) and Todmorden on March 14; Plumstead—the first Festival promoted by the Woolwich Arsenal Association—on March 14; East Grinstead on March 25; Croydon (the South Suburban Society's first Festival) and Cardiff (a very good Festival, organized by the G.W.R. Social and Educational Union), on March 28; the first children's Festival of the Stockport Co-operative Society Education Committee on April 4; and the excellent Festival which we would have been glad to notice at greater length in our last issue, held at Enfield on March 7.

In connection with the Festival of the Dorset Choral Association, at Weymouth, to be held near the end of April, preliminary local competitions were held at Dorchester, Swanage, and Wimborne. Those held at Dorchester had expanded from a half to a whole day's work (March 30), and made a very good little festival of their own.

FESTIVALS IN SCOTLAND

The Aberdeen Festival (April 15, 16 and 17) had a largely increased entry. On the choral side notable results were achieved by the male-voice choirs, and the youngest of the school classes. The instrumental work, however, gave the best all-round results, the chamber music entries and playing being specially encouraging. The Festival has had a struggle in recent seasons, but this year's event, with its larger entry and an unmistakable growth of public interest, gives the executive good ground for belief that the corner has been turned, and that Aberdeen will soon have a Festival on a scale suitable to so important a centre.

The new Monkslands Festival, held at Coatbridge, had a splendid send-off, the weight of entries necessitating the widening-out of the time-table over the greater part of a week. An interesting feature was the large number of young competitors from Glasgow who came out to try their wings. Perhaps the most attractive classes were a delightful unaccompanied Scots folk-song solo class for boys and girls, and a Scots folk-dancing class in which a number of school teams did some really fine work.

The Ninth Ayrshire Festival (two days), held at Ayr, showed increased entries and some good work, but is hardly exhibiting the vitality and width of public interest which should be expected from so musical a county and so senior a Festival (it was established in 1912).

The Fife, Kinross, and Clarkmannan Festival, held at Kirkcaldy, extended over three days, and had fifteen hundred competitors. Special features were the school choirs, school string orchestras, and the high standard of the school sight-reading.

Colville's (industrial) Festival, held at Govan, Glasgow, spread over three days and attracted good entries from the firm's many employees, but the audiences were sparser than they should have been.

The Scottish Co-operative Festival (the oldest Festival in Scotland) was held at Paisley on two consecutive Saturdays, and produced some brilliant singing, especially from the junior choirs.

Motherwell and Wishaw Festival covered three days, and showed steady progress.

The Fifth East of Scotland Co-operative Festival at Edinburgh occupied one day, and provided some good junior choir and solo singing. The adult choirs and soloists were less interesting.

The Seventh Glasgow Socialist Festival covered three days, and maintained a very satisfying general level in both the senior and the junior divisions in choral and solo singing, folk-dancing, singing games, and elocution.

BELFAST.—Good progress was shown at this year's gathering (March 30 to April 4). Choral entries were small, owing chiefly to industrial depression, but there was ample room for congratulation in other respects. The best of the school singing was well up to the high standard expected at this Festival, and the Belfast Cup Competition produced some solo work of a very high level. Despite the fact that the Festival week coincided with a general election—a powerful counter-attraction to Irish folk—a good measure of public interest was shown. Three prize-giving concerts rounded off an enjoyable week.

A NEW FESTIVAL IN LONDON

A meeting was held at Chelsea Town Hall, on March 20, to discuss the proposal to inaugurate a Festival in West London. Dr. Vaughan Williams was in the chair, Miss Edith Barran was the hon. organizing secretary of the meeting, and the chief speakers were Dr. Percy Dearmer and the Rev. C. J. Beresford. The Festival will be known as the 'Guildhouse Festival for the League of Arts, the Guildhouse, the City of Westminster, and Borough of Chelsea.'

SOUTH-EAST LONDON.—This Festival proceeds successfully on the lines laid down by the People's Palace Festival. There are no classes for soloists. Choral singing is the chief business of the scheme, and special stress is laid upon combined performance. On March 14 the fifth Festival concluded with a concert at the Great Central Hall, Bermondsey. Parry's 'There rolls the deep' and Bateson's 'Sister, awake,' were sung by massed mixed voices, Bach's 'Thou crownest the year' (arranged for two parts) by ladies' choirs, 'Strawberry Fair' (arranged by Cecil Sharp) by mothers' meetings and women's unions. Mr. Julius Harrison conducted.

Music in the Provinces

ACOMB (Yorkshire).—The small and enterprising Acomb Choral Society, conducted by Mr. T. E. Robinson, gave Gade's 'The Erl-King's Daughter' and Boughton's 'Choral Variations on English folk-songs,' on March 25. The same programme included two movements of a Mozart Quartet, Handel's 'Occasional' Overture, and two part-songs—Sullivan's 'Say, watchman' and Brewer's 'Waken, lords and ladies gay.'

ALTRINCHAM.—Stanford's four-movement Motet for double choir, 'Ye holy angels bright,' was one of the pieces sung by the Sale and District Musical Society, at Altrincham Hippodrome, on Sunday afternoon, March 22, in the cause of charity. The whole programme was on a high level. Mr. Alfred Higson conducted.

BATH.—Four successive Wednesday concerts at the Pump Room have provided four Symphonies—Dvorák's 'New World,' Glazounov's seventh, Beethoven's eighth, and Tchaikovsky's F minor—conducted by Mr. Jan Hurst.——The Choral and Orchestral Society gave Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride,' under Mr. H. T. Sims, on March 24.——Jadassohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor was part of a recent chamber music programme.——On March 20, the B.M.S. brought Mr. Steuart Wilson and Mr. Fox-Strangways for a recital of their Schubert translations.

BEACONSFIELD.—'The Golden Legend' was recently performed in good style by the Choral Society, under Mr. Reginald Hancock's direction. The orchestra included four amateur wood-wind players from the Stock Exchange Orchestra.——The Orchestral Society's programme on March 21 included Schubert's fifth Symphony, Mr. Réné Ortmans conducting.

BIRMINGHAM AND DISTRICT.—At its April meeting the City Council agreed to make a grant to the Guarantee Fund of the City Orchestra of £2,500 per annum for five years.——The last Symphony concert of the season took place on March 31, and was conducted by Mr. Adrian C. Boult. The programme included Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, Ethel Smyth's Prelude to Act 2 of 'The Wreckers,' and 'Mai-Dun,' a symphonic rhapsody by John Ireland. Miss Isolde Menges was the soloist in Dohnànyi's Concerto for violin and orchestra.——At a Sunday night concert on March 22, Schubert's Overture in the Italian style was given, and the same composer's great Symphony in C major. Mr. Boult seems to have a special sympathy for Schubert's music, and on this occasion he drew from the Orchestra some of the best playing of the season. Ravel's 'Mother Goose' Suite was included in the programme, and Mr. Steuart Wilson sang a group of Schubert's songs and Gluck's 'Che faro.' On March 29 a rather severe programme for the final Sunday concert of the season included Vaughan Williams's 'London' Symphony. Mr. Paul Beard and Mr. Frank Venton were the soloists in Mozart's 'Concertante Symphonie' for violin and viola. Both players did well, and there was much to be admired in the general ensemble.——In giving a performance of Elgar's 'The Apostles' the members of the Birmingham Choral Union essayed a task rather beyond their strength, yet they are to be commended for their courage and enterprise. The choralists were singing from parts, and without rehearsal with the City Orchestra. Miss Emily Broughton sang beautifully the music of the Blessed Virgin and the Angel. Miss Elsie Napier, Messrs. Joseph Yates, Leslie Bennett, Geoffrey Dams, and Sidney Stoddard were the other soloists. Mr. Graham Godfrey conducted.——On March 26 the Festival Choral Society, in combination with the City Orchestra, gave a good performance of Bach's Mass in B minor. Mr. Boult's tempi are perhaps a little slow, but the choral music was well and impressively sung. Madame Stiles-Allen, Miss Rose Myrtil, Mr. Robert Radford, and Mr. Archibald Winter were the soloists.——A concert of small choral works which included 'Blessing, Glory, Wisdom,' Parry's 'I know my soul hath power to know all things,' and Vaughan Williams's 'Sound Sleep' was given by the City of Birmingham Choir on March 25.——Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' was the principal feature of a concert given by the Catholic Choir. Unfortunately an organ accompaniment was substituted for the orchestra, so that the full musical value of the work was not revealed. Under the circumstances, however, the singers did well.——At a mid-day concert, on March 26, the Philharmonic Pianoforte Quartet played Dvorák's E flat Quartet, and the Scherzo from a Quartet by Fauré. At a subsequent concert Miss Elsie Stell gave McEwen's F minor Violin Sonata, with Miss Abbott at the pianoforte.

BLACKBURN.—The St. Cecilia and Vocal Union celebrated its jubilee on March 31 by a performance under Dr. E. C. Robinson of Part 1 of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám,' the soloists being Miss Muriel Brunskill, Messrs. Tudor Davies and Harold Williams. The twin title arises from the amalgamation in 1889 of the two Societies, St. Cecilia and Vocal Union, each of which was founded in 1875. The conductors from 1889 onwards have been Mr. James H. Rooks, 1889-1902; Mr. I. D. Bird, 1903; Dr. E. C. Bairstow, 1904-13; Dr. E. C. Robinson, 1914 to date. The two original Societies were more or less purely subscription affairs, Blackburn, until 1921, having had no adequate public hall capable of holding large audiences. The present King George's Hall is of noble proportions, and the 'Omar' performance was altogether an inspiring affair. In these days of pessimism in provincial choral societies, it is good to find big public support of this organization.

BLACKPOOL.—The Catholic Choral Society, under Dr. R. Dease Riley, made its first appearance with a performance of Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle.' The Raikes Parade Ladies' Choir, conducted by Mr. V. L. Hargreaves, gave its first concert with a programme of part-songs. This makes three choral societies that have come to life at Blackpool this year.——The Choral and Orchestral Society gave a performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' in March, under Mr. Percy M. Dayman.

BOSTON. — The Boston Choral Society and the Peterborough Cathedral Special Choir joined forces in an excellent performance of the 'St Matthew' Passion on April 2. The soloists were Miss Joan Elwes, Miss Lillian Berger, Mr. Archibald Winter, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Stanley Hill. Mr. John Pullein was at the organ, Dr. H. Cole at the pianoforte, and Dr. Gordon A. Slater conducted.

BOURNEMOUTH.—There was no slackening at the Winter Gardens during the approach of the Festival. In a month's programmes the following works occurred: the 'Pastoral' Symphony of Vaughan Williams, Mozart Allan's tone-poem 'The Unknown Warrior,' Paderewski's Pianoforte Concerto in A (played by Mr. Gordon Bryan), a new String Rhapsody by Cyril Rootham, Learmont Drysdale's 'Tam o' Shanter' Overture, and Brahms's first Symphony, the whole 'Hiawatha' trilogy by the Municipal Choir (the first time for nine years), Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, and Beethoven's fourth, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic'—this apart from a busy series of popular concerts and music for Easter.——The Festival opened on April 16).

BRADFORD.—A memorial concert to Stanford was given by Bradford Festival Choral Society, under Dr. Bairstow's direction, at St. George's Hall in March, the works chosen being the 'Stabat Mater' and 'Irish Rhapsody.' Mr. Harold Williams sang the 'Mystical Songs' of Vaughan Williams. ——The Bradford Permanent Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Julius Harrison, brought its season to an end on March 21 with a programme that contained the sixth Symphony of Glazounov.——The Musical Union has celebrated its Diamond Jubilee, taking three weeks to do justice to the event. There were four Saturday evenings of madrigals, glees, and part-songs, and various social events.

BRIGHTON.—The Brighton and Hove Harmonic Society had a large audience for 'The Dream of Gerontius' on March 21, and gave one of the best performances in its career. Mr. Percy Taylor conducted. The solo parts were sung by Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Ernest Hargreaves, and Mr. Robert Radford.——Two recent meetings of the Sussex Women Musicians' Club dealt with French and Russian music; papers were read and works were performed.

BRISTOL.—The B minor Mass was performed for the first time at Bristol on March 28. To the four hundred singers of the Bristol Choral Society, two hundred from the Newport Choral Society were added, and a magnificent performance was given under Mr. George Riseley. The Society responsible for this great effort had issued what was considered a tame syllabus for next season, and the local press was lively for many days with letters demanding 'The Apostles' 'The Kingdom,' Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus,' Beethoven's Mass in D, Brahms's 'Requiem,' and so forth. One writer asked for a concert version of 'The Perfect Fool.'——Miss Gertrude Winchester's Ladies' Choir sang Lawrence Powell's cantata 'Lochinvar' and many well-chosen part-songs, on March 25.——Bristol Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Arnold Barter, closed its twenty-fourth season of April 4 with Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region' and Holst's 'Turn back, O man,' besides orchestral numbers.——The Clifton Chamber concerts brought an excellent series to an end on March 16 with a programme that included Frank Bridge's Phantasy Trio.

BURTON.—'The Dream of Gerontius' had not been heard at Burton before the Musical Society's performance on March 27, and nothing so ambitious had ever been attempted by this choir of a hundred voices. The difficulties of the work were creditably overcome under the guidance of Dr. Gilbert Stocks. No doubt a representative audience will come to the next performance. The City of Birmingham Orchestra assisted, and the soloists were Miss Ivy Phillips, Mr. Osmond Davis, and Mr. Howard Fry.

CAMBRIDGE. — The Philharmonic Society and the University Musical Society Orchestra joined forces in Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' at a mid-term concert in the Guildhall. This and a Bach Concerto were given under Mr. J. F. Shepherdson. Dr. Rootham conducted his own carol, 'The Golden Time.'——A massed choir of four hundred children which had sung at one of the concerts at the competitive Festival (reported on p. 449), repeated its repertory under Mr. Field Hyde on April 3.——The last Popular concert of the season took place at the Guildhall on April 4, before a large audience.

CHELTENHAM.—The Orchestral Society of forty players, amateur and professional, gave an excellent programme at the Town Hall on March 30—the 'Hebrides' Overture, a Corelli Concerto for strings, Mozart's G minor Symphony, Holst's 'Marching Song,' Borodin's 'On the Steppes,' Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, and Tchaikovsky's 'Sleeping Beauty' Suite. The Sunday evening series at the Town Hall brought 'Elijah' on March 28, and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' on April 5. All these concerts were conducted by Mr. Leo Dawes.

CHESTER.—The two favourite Pianoforte Quintets—Schumann in E flat and Brahms in F minor—were played at a concert of the Sidebottom Trio.——The Musical Society played Beethoven's first Symphony at a poorly-attended concert on April 1.

CHESTERFIELD.—In our last issue we were unable to make reference to the performance of 'The Apostles' given by the Chesterfield and District Musical Union on March 11. This Society, conducted by Dr. J. F. Staton, has a co-operative arrangement with his choirs at Barnsley and Sheffield for mutual supply of singers, with the result that three admirable performances of 'The Apostles' were given at the three towns within a short period, all under Dr. Staton. Seventy of the Chesterfield singers took part in the performance at Barnsley next evening.

COLCHESTER.—At the Musical Society's fourth concert Mr. W. F. Kingdon conducted Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' the Sanctus from the B minor Mass, and Parry's 'Ode to Music,' these being the choral items in an enjoyable mixed concert.

COVENTRY.—On April 1, in the Cathedral, the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Charles Matthews, sang Brahms's 'Requiem' and Bach's 'God's time is the best.' Mr. G. D. Cunningham was at the organ, and an orchestra assisted. The solos were sung by members of the choir.

DARTFORD.—At the annual concert of the Choral Society the programme, given under the direction of Mr. G. H. Coombs, included four folk-song arrangements by Vaughan Williams, two Psalms by Holst, and Macfarren's 'May-day.'

DERBY.—'The Apostles' was performed for the first time at Derby on March 31, the choir being the Derby Choral Union, and the conductor Dr. Coward. Nothing so ambitious had previously been attempted by the Society, and the fine quality and deep expressiveness of the choral singing contributed to a triumph. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Millicent Russell, Mr. John Adams, Mr. Stanley Becket, Mr. James Coleman, and Mr. Norman Allin.——The concert of the Orchestral Society on April 7 was not well supported. The programme included Elgar's 'Wand of Youth' Suite.

DONCASTER. — Two parts of 'The Creation' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' were given at the Musical Society's second concert, conducted by Mr. H. A. Bennett. ——Brahms's 'Requiem' was sung in the Parish Church on April 2.

EASTBOURNE.—Rachmaninov's second Symphony was played at the Symphony concert on March 20, with Goldmark's 'Sakuntala' Overture, and the G major Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven, played by Miss Edna Iles. The Variation movement from Glazounov's sixth Symphony was played on April 5.——Mr. Horace Stevens sang as Elijah in the Choral Union's performance, under Mr. James R. Dear.

FELIXTOWE.—The Choral Society took a step upward in ambition when it chose Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and Holst's 'Two Psalms' as an evening's programme. The works were all creditably performed under Mr. Maurice Vinden.

GATESHEAD.—Choral singing of a good standard was heard at the Town Hall on March 19, when the Gateshead Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Maddock, performed Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day,' and the concert version of Gounod's 'Faust.'

GRANTHAM.—Volbach's 'The Page and the King's Daughter' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' were the principal works at a recent concert of the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. E. Brown.

GRIMSBY.—On March 20 the Orchestral Society gave the first performance at Grimsby of Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll' and 'Four Silhouettes' of Arensky. Dr. J. Williamson conducted.

HANLEY.—The North Staffs Choral Society gave a fine performance of 'The Apostles' under the direction of Mr. John James on March 19. The solo parts were sung by Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Howard Fry, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

HARROGATE.—The season of the Municipal Orchestra opened on April 8, with Mr. Basil Cameron again in charge. Some excellent programmes are in prospect. On April 11 there was a Mozart Divertimento in the programme, and and the 'Emperor' Concerto was played by M. Moiseiwitsch.

HUDDERSFIELD.—Three novelties were in the programme of the Corporation Popular Concert on March 21, viz., a set of Variations by Geoffrey Shaw, Stanford's 'March Eroica,' and an excerpt from Stravinsky's 'Fire-bird.' Mr. Arthur Pearson conducted.——Part-songs by Elgar were sung by the Colne Valley Male-Voice Choir, under Mr. George Stead. ——At a concert given by Dr. Hull a sum of money was raised for the Huddersfield Music Library, which has already proved itself popular and useful.

HULL.—Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony was substituted for the second Symphony of Sibelius at the last Philharmonic concert. Sir Henry Wood conducted, and the programme included the Handel-Elgar Overture.——A Quintet by Arensky and a Trio by Godard were played at a recent chamber concert given by Miss Jessie Mayer.

IPSWICH.—At the last Municipal concert of the season, conducted by Mr. Edgar Wilby, an Overture, 'Plymouth Hoe,' by John Ansell, was played.——On March 31 the Male-Voice Choir sang Reger's 'The Call of Spring' and Hegar's 'The Phantom Host,' the Catterall Quartet played Beethoven in A major, and Mr. John Goss sang.

KEIGHLEY.—The programme of the Choral Society's concert on March 17 consisted of the choric idyll 'Pan,' by Dr. Charles Harriss, who was prevented by illness from coming to conduct it, Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day,' and Frederick Bridge's 'Ballad of the Clampherdown.' Mr. C. Stott conducted.

KIDDERMINSTER.—Walford Davies's 'Everyman' was performed with fine effect by the Choral Society under Mr. Irving Glover on April 1, with the assistance of players from the Birmingham City Orchestra. Mr. John Buckley sang the part of Everyman.

LEEDS.—The Philharmonic Chorus and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra gave Verdi's 'Requiem' on March 18, under Dr. E. C. Bairstow. The programme included two Motets by Gerald Finzi and Parry's Symphonic Variations. The Philharmonic Society is said to be in financial difficulties that threaten its existence.——The choral event of the season was the first performance in England of Florent Schmitt's setting of the forty-seventh Psalm, given on April 1 by the Leeds Choral Union, with the composer conducting. It contains a soprano solo which Miss Elsie Suddaby sang. The music is difficult, and 'breathes triumphant ferocity and fanaticism.' Dr. Coward took sixteen preliminary rehearsals. The Psalm was followed by Beethoven's Mass in D.——Mr. Goossens conducted a classical programme at the Saturday Orchestral Concert of March 14. A fortnight later Mr. Edward Maude's String Orchestra gave an excellent programme. It included a Domenico Scarlatti Suite arranged by Julius Harrison, Sibelius's Suite, 'The Lover' (Op. 14), a Byrd Fantasy, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Two Novelettes,' Bach's C minor two-Pianoforte Concerto, and some Percy Grainger pieces.—— A thousand children heard the concert of the Leeds Symphony Society on April 4.——The String Quartet in G minor of Vaughan Williams was played at the Hotel Metropole Bohemian chamber concert on April 8, when the Leeds musical season concluded.

LEICESTER.—Under Dr. Malcolm Sargent the Symphony Orchestra gave a classical evening on March 26—the 'Eroica' Symphony, a 'Brandenburg' Concerto, and the Brahms B flat Pianoforte Concerto (M. Phillipowsky). Miss Dorothy Silk sang Bach's 'Comfort sweet' and some English songs.

LIVERPOOL.—In amends for a not very satisfactory performance of Vaughan Williams's 'Sea' Symphony at its previous concert, the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union sang splendidly in 'The Dream of Gerontius' on March 28, Mr. Hopkin Evans conducting.——The Philharmonic Society ended its season with an abridged version of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám,' conducted by the composer. ——On the part of the Liverpool Choral Society there is an Eastertide 'Messiah,' under Mr. Percival Ingram, to record.——The new Auxiliary Orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, composed of young players who hope some day to belong to the senior orchestra, gave a concert on March 29. Under Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd they showed up well in Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' and a D major Symphony of Mozart.——A women's orchestra is being organized for Liverpool. The string section, twenty-five strong, played Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite, on March 22, at the David Lewis Theatre.——The most interesting of recent concerts on a smaller scale was that given by Miss Isolde Menges and the English Singers. A Schubert String Quintet was played at a Rodewald concert in March. The McCullagh Quartet played part of Haydn's 'Seven Words of our Saviour on the Cross' in the Cathedral on Good Friday, after the afternoon service.——On April 6, Mr. Gustav Holst performed his first duty as the first James W. Alsop Lecturer at the University. His subject was 'The Education of a Composer.'

LONG EATON.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan' and Hubert Bath's 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean' were given by the Choral Society on March 19, Mr. Charles Riley conducting.

LOWESTOFT.—On Good Friday the Musical Society performed its first work of Bach—the 'St. Matthew' Passion, which was said to be new to Lowestoft. The performance took place at the Hippodrome, under the direction of Mr. C. J. R. Coleman. The accompaniment was played on pianoforte and organ.

MALVERN.—The chorus and orchestra of Malvern Choral Society, two hundred strong, reached a very good standard with a performance of Brahms's 'Requiem,' on March 17, under the direction of Sir Ivor Atkins. The soloists were Miss Maryan Elmar and Mr. Frederick Woodhouse.

MANCHESTER.—At this time of the year music here may best be described in the jargon of the cotton market reports as being of the 'sorting up' character. The principal concerts having been brought to a conclusion, comment is restricted to sundries. The Hallé Pension Fund concert was in everything save the attendance of the public a fitting climax to a season of fine playing. Arthur Catterall will no longer act as leader, on account of his decision to devote more time and energy to solo playing and the claims of the Catterall String Quartet; many people have an inkling as to the identity of his successor, but nothing has been disclosed to the public. Mr. H. M. Dawber (who rehearsed the chorus for the recent B minor Mass in his then capacity of assistant chorus-master) has now been officially appointed Hallé Chorus-master in place of Mr. R. H. Wilson, who has retired after thirty-six years' work.——The Manchester Vocal Society, conducted by Mr. H. M. Dawber, on March 25 introduced to the Manchester public Ernest Bryson's setting of fragments from Walt Whitman, which he has assembled and styled 'Drum Taps.' This I take to be the best alla cappella music written during those war years by a native composer. Wisely or not (the latter, I think), he has scored an ad lib. part for side-drum; if any conductor thinks of giving this fine choral suite, I would, on the evidence of this performance, counsel its omission, or, at most, play it muffled. It did not disturb pitch, for Mr. Dawber's singers are competence personified, but, somehow, even with the score before him and knowledge of what was coming, it did disturb one sympathetic listener's train of thought and emotion. Any aspiring chorus-master and choir will find in this impressive suite a subject for keen and interesting preparation.——Mr. John Ireland's visit on March 30, when he played in his Phantasy Trio, second Violin Sonata, and 'Cello Sonata, was not the convincing success we had anticipated after hearing, a fortnight earlier, the masterly handling (by Murdoch and Arthur Catterall) of his earlier Violin Sonata, when its gaunt, rather rugged moorland quality of musical landscape was very vividly realised. The 'Cello Sonata, by comparison with this, seemed tentative; nothing in it gripped the emotions. Mr. Edward Isaacs this season has brought to Manchester many interesting and sometimes stimulating players, none more so than this son of Manchester, John Ireland. Miss Dorothy Moulton's singing at this concert was the best Lieder singing by a native artist heard by me for many years.——Miss Jelly d'Aranyi, at a Tuesday mid-day recital on April 7, played Mozart and Bach just as superbly as at a recent Hallé concert. Nobody here has ever done the Rondo from the 'Haffner' Serenade in a style which so united rapidity and clarity. C. H.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—'The Call of Gideon,' a new cantata, by Mr. R. G. Thompson, was given its first performance at the Town Hall on March 19, by a choir of five hundred voices, under the composer's direction.——The Musical Union gave 'The Dream of Gerontius' for the first time in over twenty years, Mr. Gavin Kay conducting. The solo parts were taken by Miss Marie Cartwright, Mr. Frank Titterton, and Mr. Stuart Robertson. Two movements of Dvorák's Symphony in G were played as prelude.

NEWCASTLE.—The Mass in G minor of Vaughan Williams was heard for the second time at Newcastle at a concert of the Armstrong College Choral and Orchestral Societies. Dr. Whittaker conducted a sympathetic performance. In the same programme were Beethoven's second Symphony and Bach's Concerto in D for three pianofortes and strings.——'King Olaf' was given by the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union on March 25, under Dr. Whittaker's direction.——The choral 'Cycle of the Sea,' by Gerrard Williams, was sung by the Oriana Choir on April 1, in a programme that included madrigals and Elgar part-songs. Mr. Arthur T. Milner conducted.——The Y.M.C.A. Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Arthur W. Lambert, gave two works of Coleridge-Taylor on April 1—'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and 'Sea-Drift.'——Dr. Whittaker and the Bach Choir gave the whole of the 'St. Matthew' Passion on the afternoon and evening of April 4. The Chorale in the first chorus was sung by sopranos from Armstrong College and Rutherford College Girls' School.——Recent orchestral concerts have included an excellent programme ('Brandenburg' Concerto, 'Petite Suite' by Debussy, 'Puck's Minuet' by Howells) played at the Town Hall by the Benton Orchestral Society under Mr. Tom H. Clay; the Northumberland Orchestral Society (Mr. Cuthbert Horsley) in Beethoven's fifth Symphony; and a Mozart Bassoon Concerto played by Mr. Archie Camden at a concert of the Newcastle Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Hamilton Harty conducting.

OXFORD.—The musical achievement of the term was the performance of the complete 'St. Matthew' Passion by the Oxford Bach Choir. The work was given in two parts on March 1 and 8. Sir Hugh Allen conducted, and the solo parts were sung by Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Archibald Winter, Mr. Keith Falkner, and Mr. Stuart Robertson.——On March 5 the Oxford Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Maurice Besly, played Reger's 'Variations on a Theme by Mozart.'——Oxford Harmonic Society gave Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation' on March 15, under Mr. Reginald Jacques.

PAINSWICK.—A chamber concert was recently given in connection with the Federation of Music Clubs, the programme consisting of the Pianoforte Quintets of Franck and Elgar, and the String Quartet of Vaughan Williams.

PERSHORE.—The Musical Society gave its most ambitious concert at the Abbey on March 26 in performing Bach's 'God so loved the world' and the Mozart twelfth Mass. The Rev. Gurnsay W. Webb conducted.

PETERSFIELD.—The chamber concert series was extended on March 24 to include a recital by Mr. Steuart Wilson, who sang Schubert songs and, with full chamber music accompaniment, the 'Wenlock Edge' cycle of Vaughan Williams.

PLYMOUTH.—At a recent concert the Plymouth Madrigal Society sang many madrigals and part-songs, including 'Charm me to sleep' by the conductor, Dr. Lake.——Before competing at the London Festival the Ladies' Choir sang its test-pieces and the Rhinemaidens' music at a concert on March 21, Mr. Harry Woodward conducting.

PORTSMOUTH.—The Philharmonic Society brought a very good season to an end with a fine performance of Verdi's 'Requiem,' under Dr. Malcolm Sargent, on April 2.——At a meeting held in March, Mr. Hugh Burry proposed that a Portsmouth Elizabethan and Bach Society should be formed.

PRESTON.—Stanford's choral overture, 'Ave atque vale,' was coupled with Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' at the March concert of the Choral Society. Dr. F. H. Wood conducted.——Trios by Tchaikovsky, John Ireland, and Arensky, were heard at the Guildhall on the occasion of a visit by the Liverpool Chamber Music Players.

RAMSGATE.—'The Creation' (Parts 1 and 2) and 'The Black Knight' were performed by the Choral and Orchestral Society, under Mr. P. Vincent Henniker, on March 19. The orchestra was augmented by members of the Royal Engineers Band from Chatham.

RAWMARSH.—The Rawmarsh and Parkgate Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. G. Steel, gave a highly creditable performance of 'King Olaf,' on March 19, at Rawmarsh Wesleyan Church (for lack of an adequate concert-hall).

REDHILL.—Mr. W. H. Reed conducted the Redhill Society of Instrumentalists, at its second concert, in Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Liadov's 'Kikimora,' and a Mozart Violin Concerto, played by Miss Isolde Menges.

ROCHDALE.—The chief of recent choral events have been performances of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' by Union Street Wesleyan Church, under Mr. Oscar Clifton, a miscellaneous concert (Holst's four 'Hymns from the Rig Veda') by the Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. George Whitaker, and 'The Golden Legend,' sung by the Royle Operatic Choir at the Hippodrome on April 5, under Mr. Fred Royle.

RUGBY.—Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed on April 2 in Temple Speech Room by the Philharmonic Society. The choir sang well under the direction of Mr. F. Yuille Smith, who deputised for the regular conductor, Mr. K. A. Stubbs. The 'Requiem' was preceded by Haydn's 'Insanæ et vanæ curæ.'

SHEFFIELD.—Dr. Coward's 'Sheffield Choir,' officially known as the Sheffield Musical Union, will celebrate its jubilee next year. Two extra concerts will be added to the end of its season, one a performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' on festival scale (March 24) and the second a concert of 'Old Memories' (March 25). The choir brought this year's season to an end on March 26 with 'Samson and Delilah.'——The Amateur Musical Society gave 'The Apostles' on March 31, under Dr. J. F. Staton, this being the third of his societies to perform the oratorio, on lines of mutual help, during March. The principals were Miss Ida Cooper, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Richard Ripley, Mr. Stanley Jepson, Mr. Booth Unwin, and Mr. Lee Thistlethwaite.——The last days of March brought plenty of choral concerts besides these. The choral and orchestral sections of the University Musical Society gave Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' under Mr. G. E. Linfoot, in the presence of Mr. H. A. L. Fisher; the orchestra played Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite. Lipton Choral Society (Mr. Cecil Free) gave a miscellaneous programme. Miss Eva Rich's Ladies' Choir gave Holst's 'Hymn to Dionysus,' a cantata 'The Angels,' arranged from Bach by W. G. Whittaker—these with orchestral accompaniment—and Malcolm Davidson's three-part 'The Downs' with violin obbligato. This choir had given a concert to two thousand children a few days earlier, co-operating with Mr. G. E. Linfoot, the Education Committee's Musical Adviser. 'Athalie' was sung by a choir under Mr. W. H. Dawn at Wesley Hall, Crookes.——Easter music included 'Elijah,' by the Victoria Hall Choral Society.——The Yorkshire String Quartet has officiated at all four of the University chamber music recitals for the season. On March 6 it was joined by Mrs. Leathes in the Dvorák Pianoforte Quintet; on March 27 the Quartet played a selection of Joseph Speaight's 'Shakespeare Characters.' At the Foxon five-o'clock concerts a Brahms programme was recently given with Sir Henry Hadow as lecturer, and on March 4 the Rosé Quartet played three classical works.——The subscription concert of March 12 brought together Madame Fachiri, Mr. Maurice Cole, Anne Thursfield, and Mr. John Goss—almost an excess of talent for the sharing of one programme. This series promises the Queen's Hall Orchestra twice next season.——Two 'Cello Sonatas of Grieg were played by Mr. Collin Smith and Mrs. Leathes at a University recital.——The Foxon series ended on April 1, with a lecture on Fugues by Canon Darbyshire, Archdeacon of Sheffield, who took as his text, 'Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha' and Mr. Birrell's foot-note explanation that 'a fugue is a short melody.'——The weekly people's concert at Victoria Hall on April 4 was the seven-hundred-and-thirty-second organized by Mr. Robert Wright.

TAUNTON.—A performance of Elgar's 'The Music-Makers' was given by the Choral Society on April 27, with Miss Margaret Balfour as contralto soloist. The programme included Elizabethan madrigals and orchestral works. Mr. Reginald Ward conducted.——The Madrigal Society, also under Mr. Ward, ended its season with a smoking concert at which the programme included Byrd's 'While that the sun,' two of Elgar's Greek Anthology part-songs, and several arranged folk-songs.

TIVERTON.—The Tiverton Choral Society was recently formed, and gave its first concert with a successful part-song programme. The conductor is Mr. F. G. Dyer.

TODMORDEN.—A party of boys originally brought together as an appreciation class by Mr. Ronald Cunliffe, and now trained by him as artists, gave a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Coq d'Or' on April 1. (Last year they did 'The Magic Flute.') Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, who was present, made a speech of congratulation, and wrote a column in The Times about it.

TORQUAY.—At the seventh Symphony Concert of the Winter Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Ernest W. Cross, Mr. W. L. Twining conducted his MS. Overture in B flat. Dr. Harold Rhodes played the Grieg Pianoforte Concerto.——The Musical Society of Torquay secondary schools was conducted by Mr. Harold Belchamber in Haydn's 'Military' Symphony and a selection of old English folk-songs, sea songs and shanties, on April 1 and 2.

WINDSOR.—The Magnificat from Byrd's Great Service, the Largo from the 'New World' Symphony, and 'The Dream of Gerontius'—this remarkable programme was performed, very thoroughly, in the School Hall, Eton College, on March 25, by the Windsor and Eton Choral Society under the direction of the Rev. Bernard Everett. Mr. Basil Johnson was at the organ.

WORCESTER.—Holst's 'Ode to Death' made a profound impression when it was performed, with the second Act of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' by the Festival Choral Society under Sir Ivor Atkins on March 24. Between the two choral works the fifth 'Brandenburg' Concerto was played.——The Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. George Austin, jun., ended its season on March 22. The programme included the 'Unfinished' Symphony.——Sir Edward Elgar conducted his second 'Wand of Youth' Suite at the Orchestral Society's concert on April 4. Sir Ivor Atkins conducted the orchestra in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and the Worcestershire Ladies' Choral Society in a selection of part-songs and Holst's four 'Hymns from the Rig Veda.' Songs were given by Miss Dorothy Silk.

YORK.—The concert of the York Musical Society on March 19 was made specially interesting by the performance of two choral Motets by Mr. Gerald Finzi, a young pupil of Dr. Bairstow. The first is a setting of Henry Vaughan's metrical version of Psalm 121, and the second a setting of lines from Treherne's 'The Recovery.' The music is well written, and shows distinct originality, with a reflection of Holst. The Motets were repeated at the end of the concert. The programme, given under Dr. Bairstow's direction, included Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin,' with Mr. Robert Radford as the Mayor, and the Symphonic Variations.——Holst's Fugal Concerto for flute and oboe was a feature of the Symphony Orchestra's concert on April 1. The Symphony was one of Haydn's, in D. Mr. H. A. Bennett conducted.

Music in Scotland

EDINBURGH.—The Edinburgh Choral Union (Mr. Greenhouse Allt) sang Handel's 'Israel in Egypt,' the choral work varying between the perfunctory and the very good. The Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society provided accompaniments which were very lacking in freedom and confidence.——Many other choral societies have been active. The Edinburgh Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Archibald Russell) revived Félicien David's symphonic ode, 'The Desert.' The Glasgow Orpheus Choir gave two concerts, repeating the programmes given at Glasgow. Mr. Moodie's Choir (Mr. James Moodie) gave an all-Scottish programme of part-songs, &c. St. Serf's Musical Association (Mr. T. Paterson Lamb) sang Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan.' The combined choirs of the Scottish Girls' Friendly Society and the Girl Guides (Mrs. Alex. Maitland), assisted by Miss Dorothy Silk, gave a concert, the most interesting feature of which was the uniformly high quality of the music selected for performance. The Edinburgh Choral Union Advanced Preparatory Class (Mr. W. Prentice Torrance) sang selections from 'The Creation.' Mr. Godfrey's Choir (Mr. Gavin Godfrey) gave a part-song concert.——The Leith Amateur Operatic Society (Mr. W. Gilchrist Cochrane) gave a concert which included Mozart's E flat Symphony, and the Leith Choral Society (Mr. Christie Jupp) gave a programme of part-songs, &c.——At the last of Prof. Tovey's Sunday Evening Concerts, the Reid Orchestra played a Mozart programme, containing a Horn Concerto, part of a Flute and Harp Concerto, and a Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, in which Prof. Tovey played the pianoforte part and Miss Mary Grierson made a successful début as conductor.——Mr. Rae Robertson (who made his first appearance at Edinburgh) and Mr. William Primrose combined forces in a pianoforte and violin recital which included Sonatas by Brahms and Debussy, and pianoforte and violin solos.——An attractive recital by the Edinburgh Bach Society (Mr. Douglas Dickson) included the restored Violin Concerto in D minor, the Sanctus in D, and excerpts from two of Bach's Church Cantatas; also Motets by Palestrina and Josquin des Prés.

GLASGOW.—The Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton) gave a four-night concert in St. Andrew's Hall to audiences aggregating over ten thousand people. Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' superbly sung, occupied pride of place on the programme, which included, amongst other fine things, madrigals by Orlando Gibbons, Marenzio, and Palestrina, Stanford's 'Blue Bird,' Besly's 'O, lily lady of loveliness,' and a sweeping Bach Chorale. Anne Thursfield was the soloist each evening, and sang a wide range of art- and folk-songs.——The Glasgow Bach Society (Mr. J. Michael Diack and Mr. F. H. Bisset) sang in St. Mary's Cathedral two Church Cantatas, 'The Hundredth Psalm' and 'Praise Jehovah in His Splendour,' and excerpts from the 'St. Matthew' Passion. The Society's Orchestra provided the accompaniments and played selections from Bach's Orchestral Suites. The choral singing and the playing of the strings were on probably a higher level than anything the Bach Society has ever done, but the solo singing was not up to the same high standard.——The Glasgow Athenæum School of Music Orchestra, conducted by the leader of the Scottish Orchestra, Mr. Horace Fellowes, played with quite a considerable amount of success a programme which included the 'Eroica' Symphony, the 'Egmont' Overture, a Mozart Flute Concerto, and part of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto.——M. Jaques-Dalcroze, with the assistance of a group of his students, gave lecture-demonstrations of Eurhythmics at Glasgow and Edinburgh, to large audiences.——The Glasgow Wireless Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Herbert A. Carruthers, is giving a short series of orchestral concerts in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow. Public concerts have also been given at Edinburgh and Dundee by the British Broadcasting Company. Although announced as for charitable purposes, the innovation is regarded with some disquietude by other concert promoters.——The Carl Rosa Opera Company made one or two commendable departures from its standard repertory during a visit to Glasgow. The most interesting was Mozart's one-Act 'Impresario.' 'Shaun the Post,' an operatic version of Dion Boucicault's 'Arrah-na-Pogue,' composed and adapted by Dermot Macmurrogh, turned out to be a thoroughly old-fashioned and not very interesting production of the ballad opera type.——Wellington U.F. Church Choir got away from the beaten track with a performance of Mackenzie's 'Rose of Sharon,' spread over two nights, Mr. Fred Turner directing.——Concerts of part-songs, &c., were given by the Glasgow Lyric Choir (Mr. Purcell J. Mansfield), the Wallace-Scott Factory Choir (Mr. F. O. Sheard), the Glasgow Corporation Tramways Choir (Mr. Wilfrid H. Phillips), the Glasgow Select Choir (Mr. Herbert G. Cross), and Shawlands Choral Union (Mr. Ernest E. Gordon).——The Scottish Song Society's Ladies' Choir (Miss Mary Dixon) gave a plebiscite programme of Scottish song.——Mr. Warren Wynne and Miss Dorothy Robson gave vocal recitals in Paterson's Recital Hall, and Miss Nellie Justice a pianoforte recital in Rankine Hall.——Mr. John Ireland, assisted by competent artists, gave a recital of his own works under the ægis of the Glasgow centre of the British Music Society.

OTHER TOWNS.—The Aberdeen Oratorio Choir (Mr. Willan Swainson) sang Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in the Music Hall, Aberdeen.——Mr. Douglas Cameron, a Dundee 'cellist who has been studying in London for several years, gave his first recital in his native city, and created an excellent impression in an ambitious programme which included the Elgar Concerto, the Grieg Sonata, and the Boëllmann Variations.——The Glasgow Orpheus Choir sang at Aberdeen, Brechin, Blairgowrie, Dunfermline, and Kirkcaldy.——The Sheffield Choir, under Dr. Henry Coward, visited Dumfries and sang Elgar's 'Gerontius' to a very large audience.——The Stirling Choral Society, having taken a fresh lease of life under its new conductor, Mr. H. G. Barrett, of Glasgow, gave a brilliant performance of 'The Creation,' which aroused considerable enthusiasm.——Paisley Choral Union sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' under the direction of Dr. William Rigby.——'Judas Maccabæus' was sung at Hawick by the Hawick Choral Union (Mr. David B. Simpson), and at Blairgowrie by the Blairgowrie and Rattray Choral Society (Mr. E. F. Parker).——Bathgate Choral Union (Mr. Hugh Somerville) sang Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation' and some part-songs.——Brechin Choral Society, at its annual concert, sang 'The Creation.'——Concerts of part-songs, &c., were given by Kilwinning Musical Society (Mr. John Douglas) and Forres Musical Association (Mrs. Douglas).

Music in Wales

ABERYSTWYTH.—At the last College concert of the term Mr. Harold Samuel gave a Bach recital which included the Toccata in G minor, the Partita in D major, and the 'Italian' Concerto, as well as a number of the Preludes and Fugues from the 'Well-Tempered Clavier.'

CAERSALEM NEWYDD.—On March 28, a performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion took place under the baton of Mr. J. B. Rogers. The principals were Miss Margaret Harrison, Miss Muriel Hughes, Mr. T. J. Pickering, and Mr. W. R. Allen. The orchestra was led by Mr. Morgan Lloyd.——On March 29, a choir of forty from St. David's Roman Catholic Church gave a performance of Weber's Mass in G, conducted by Mrs. B. Thomas. The accompaniments were played by a few strings, with clarinet and pianoforte. The soloists were Miss Carrie O'Connell, Miss Violet Denkin, Mr. Owen Evans, and Mr. John Poole.

CARDIFF.—On March 28, Mr. Herbert Ware's Orchestra gave a performance of Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony, and Mr. Rowsby Woof gave a lecture on the work. The programme included Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite for strings.——On April 8, Star Street Congregational Church Choir gave a concert consisting of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha,' two Motets by Parry, and Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a Northern Land.'——On April 11 the Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir, conducted by Mr. Jenkyn Morris, gave a performance of 'The Messiah,' assisted by Mr. Herbert Ware's String Orchestra.——The British National Opera Company has been giving a fortnight's opera, among the works included being 'Le Coq d'Or,' 'Hugh the Drover,' and 'At the Boar's Head.'——On Good Friday the B.N.O.C. combined with the Cardiff Musical Society to give a concert performance of 'Parsifal.' Mr. Aylmer Buesst conducted.

NEWPORT.—On April 2, the Newport and Bristol Choral Societies combined to give a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, conducted by Mr. Arthur Sims. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Blodwen Caerleon, Mr. T. J. Pickering, and Mr. Glyn Eastman. The orchestra was led by Mr. Percival Hodgson.

PENARTH.—On March 1, Trinity Wesleyan Choir gave Brahms's 'Requiem,' preceded by some solos from 'The Messiah.' Mr. F. A. Sully was at the organ.

Music in Ireland

BELFAST.—Quite a notable event in the musical annals of Belfast was the jubilee concert of the Philharmonic Society, at Ulster Hall, on April 9. Fifty years is a long life for an Irish—or, indeed, any provincial—musical organization, and it was in the fitness of things that the celebration should be worthy the occasion. Accordingly, it was decided to produce Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius,' with an orchestra of ninety and a chorus of three hundred and fifty voices, under the conductorship of Sir Henry Wood. It is sufficient to say that the highest expectations of the committee were fully realised, and the concert was a huge success from every point of view. Rarely has Elgar's glorious work been better produced, and the solos were in the capable hands of Mrs. John Seeds, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Harold Williams, while choir and orchestra were admirably responsive to the baton of Sir Henry Wood, who personally superintended the final rehearsals. It is of interest to add that Elgar's great work had been given by the Philharmonic Society in 1905 and 1907. Nor must it be forgotten that the lion's share of the preparation of the performance fell on Mr. Godfrey Brown, who has been conductor for twelve years. Mr. J. H. MacBratney (the gifted son of a gifted father) presided at the organ.

CORK.—The Oratorio Society of St. Finn Barre's Cathedral, founded for the purpose of producing oratorios and other large works, gave Brahms's 'Requiem' and Holst's two Psalms on March 24. Mr. J. T. Horne conducted.——On Easter Monday night, at the Opera House, Theo Gmür's opera, 'Edelweiss,' was revived with remarkable success under the baton of the composer, who originally produced it over a quarter-of-a-century ago at Cork.

SERGEI PROKOFIEV'S OPERA AT COLOGNE

Seldom has a theatre resounded with so much gaiety as was heard at the Cologne Stadttheater when 'The Love of the Three Oranges,' by Sergei Prokofiev, was performed. It was the European début of this work, which had its première at the Chicago Opera-house. The success won in America had no practical consequence for a long time. It is the great merit of Cologne to have drawn public attention to the opera, and the number of critics and music-lovers who travelled from abroad proved the interest aroused by the event.

The Cologne Opera-house, which not so long ago had found in Otto Klemperer a musical director of enterprising spirit and noble intentions, possesses now, in Eugen Szenkar—formerly Kapellmeister of the Berlin Volksoper—an organizing enthusiast able to give the stage new impulses, while holding fast, in some sort, to tradition.

It has often been said that opera is a dead genre of music. Stravinsky is an example of a musician who, having won fame through ballet and opera, turns aside from their pursuit, and throws off all connection with literature and the stage. Prokofiev has not so decided. He is full of life, and of a certain gaiety longing for self-expression, be it in concert music or in opera. Independent of the whim of a collaborator, he prefers to make his own libretto. Going back to Carlo Gozzi, Prokofiev finds a spirit who, though distant in time, is very near to him in character. The Märchen, as seen from an ironical point of view, appeals very much to our composer, who, as a child of our age, has, of course, a sharper wit than his inspiring predecessor. Prokofiev does not simply take what he found in Gozzi, he has transformed and transfused it with his own ideas. We find even the relics of the old Greek chorus in the observers standing on either side of the stage, very much interested in the action but taking no part in it till the moment of greatest stress. They accompany the action with their applause or with their disapproval, being on very friendly terms with the hero of the piece. This is a young prince who cannot be made to laugh. An evil spirit encourages him to go out in search of certain Three Oranges, which are nothing less than three princesses hidden in orange peel. The adventure is long and varied, and affords the composer many opportunities for displaying his rhythmic inventiveness. Though he employs all the methods of modern composition, and does not spare uncommon intervals, he always remembers that rhythm is the soul of music, and, presenting his subjects in strong, rhythmical outline, he never makes his hearer disagreeably conscious of the modernity of the music. He does not cling to any theory, but gives vent only to his natural buoyancy, which pours into his music. So we find it much more intimately connected with life than a great deal of the music of to-day. There is a festival march which may be taken to be a kind of Leitmotiv running through the whole opera. The instrumental part of the score is very appropriate to the musical idiom. Much of the effect produced upon the audience depends, however, upon Prokofiev's way of handling the orchestra, and making his subjects to live by their innate forcefulness. The March theme and the prince's laughter exemplify his capacity for communicating his own gaiety to the spectators.

Hans Strohbach, a young artist who had been called to Cologne for the stage management, and Eugen Szenkar, who conducted the orchestra with great skill, if not with the verve required by the composer, helped 'The Love of the Three Oranges' to win a great success.

OTTORINO RESPIGHI AT HAMBURG STADTTHEATER

Hamburg Stadttheater is yet another enterprising house. The first German performance of Respighi's 'Belfagor' was a musical event that drew much attention. Respighi is particularly appreciated in Germany, where he had lived and studied before the war. Among the elements of which his compositions consist, it is not difficult to find German influences, especially that of Richard Strauss, from whom he borrowed many orchestral effects. Yet his judgment is so refined that in his eclecticism he stands much above the level of other composers who are his equals in imaginative power.

As an opera composer he was quite new to the German public. The plot of 'Belfagor,' which was performed at the Scala Theatre, need not be reported here. Suffice it to say that in the music may be found traces of Puccini, particularly in the lyrical parts. But Respighi's style is very unlike that of Puccini. A born symphonist, he has to renounce his bent when composing an opera, and in general he succeeds. He often makes use of impressionistic effects that are peculiar to himself, and in combining melodic sweetness with orchestral colour he does not lag behind any other opera composer. In the end, however, we notice that his operatic writing reveals always a certain constraint. Unlike Puccini's, Respighi's melody is not spontaneous. We admire his perfect métier without submitting to the power of his temperament.

The performance was conducted by Werner Wolff, a gifted musician, who was more able to find the right interpretative style for an Italian opera than, probably, other German Kapellmeisters.

CHAMBER MUSIC IN THE NOVEMBER GROUP

It was a model programme that the November Group offered its hearers. A Duo for violin and 'cello, by Hanns Eisler, the young Schönberg pupil, was opposed to Ravel's work for the same instruments, which apparently the younger composer had taken as his exemplar. But how different his way of using his instruments! Whereas Ravel remains the musician of refined taste, Eisler proves a stormy and passionate young man who does not spare us any harshness. However, his Duo—much shorter than that of Ravel—is quite satisfying in its formal structure.

In the middle of the programme we heard again the well-known 'Cello Sonata by Zoltán Kodály and a new composition by Philipp Jarnach, called 'Sonatina,' a name that seems to be rather a witticism when given to a piece of so great dimensions and of no little difficulty. It may be reckoned among the best pianoforte compositions of our day. All that is modern has its place in this Sonatina, but it has been developed in a very undogmatic and independent manner, and is convincing from the player's standpoint. An excellent exponent indeed is Philipp Jarnach, who played his work so clearly and effectively that it evoked hearty applause. On the whole this programme was well chosen to exhibit modern music from its best and most sympathetic side. The violinist was Novak Novak and the 'cellist Frank.

WEINGARTNER, FURTWÄNGLER, AND KLEIBER

Weingartner, back from England, made a profession of his faith in a Beethoven programme. This was moreover the profession of a style essentially different from that of the younger conductors. It was very interesting indeed to hear it after the Beethoven performances of Kleiber and Furtwängler. We found out that the architectural line of Beethoven, so often changed by the younger conductors, was re-established by Weingartner. He is simple in his musical thinking, whereas the younger school likes to elaborate Beethoven. Which of them is right? It cannot be denied that Weingartner's Beethoven is much more true to tradition than, e.g., that of Furtwängler and Kleiber, who, in presenting a more problematic and striving Beethoven, try to probe the depth of his work without caring about convention. The great public, always easily fascinated by the more emotional art of interpretation, turns more readily to the younger conductors than it does to Weingartner.

A PRE-BACH CONCERT

What Johann Sebastian Bach owed to Buxtehude is well known, but it is never so clearly proved as when performance forces a comparison of their works. It may be that a great injustice is done to Buxtehude when all the honour is won by his pupil. When hearing a work like the E minor Prelude and Fugue by Buxtehude we are very strongly reminded of the relationship existing between the two composers, and of the duty to be fulfilled with regard to Buxtehude. This was well demonstrated by a concert given in the Garnison-Kirche, where the organist Walter Fischer, the Madrigal Choir conducted by Prof. Thiel, and the singer Emmy Leisner, devoted their forces to Buxtehude, Franck, and Bruhns. It was one of those evenings that stand out in a musical life, the more so as the church lies far from that part of Berlin where the great concerts take place. That is why the music critic has to wait for the end of the season for his opportunity.

ADOLF WEISSMANN.

NEW YORK

From October to April our five orchestras (three resident organizations, and those visiting from Boston and Philadelphia) give over two hundred concerts in New York City—for music-lovers to hear and for critics to write about. Of course the same audiences do not attend the whole scheme (the critics, however, must always be on hand), but New York possesses a sufficient number of music-lovers who attend at least three out of the various series offered to the subscribers. The Philharmonic has four series in Carnegie Hall, one in the Metropolitan Opera-house, and one in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The New York Symphony has three series, two in Carnegie Hall and one in Æolian Hall. The Boston Symphony has three series, two in Carnegie Hall and one in the Brooklyn Academy. In Carnegie Hall the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony repeat each performance once—that is, one afternoon and one evening are repetitions. The Boston Symphony repeats no programmes, and plays repetitions only when some numbers from either the Thursday evenings or Saturday afternoons are repeated at the Brooklyn concerts. The Philadelphia Orchestra gives ten evenings at Carnegie Hall, but no afternoon concerts; and not only are there no repetitions during the ten evenings, but there are no repetitions in two successive years. How many people stop to think of the labour of the various conductors in arranging these programmes? What have they to choose from after the Symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky, and a few of Haydn, Mozart, and Schumann? The audiences call for novelties, especially that part of them that go to two or three different series. What is there for them to hear? Kussewitzky (perhaps from a burst of patriotic feeling) tried giving Głazounov's No. 8, in E flat. A duller thing we never listened to, and with what relief we saw Albert Spalding coming on to the platform with his violin, and heard him play Bach's Concerto in E major! Mr. Spalding is a very good violinist, and when he plays Bach he is doubly interesting. To return to the programme question, sometimes no symphony is in the bill, as there are not enough to go round. In this case the conductor often fills the gap with a Strauss tone-poem. 'Death and Transfiguration,' 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Don Juan,' and 'Heldenleben' have become as hackneyed as the eternally repeated classic symphonies, but 'Don Quixote' (so seldom heard), when played by the Philharmonic, had such a warm reception that Bruno Walter (guest-conductor of the New York Symphony) put it in one of his programmes almost immediately afterwards. It seemed as if Herr Walter's reading was even better than that of Mengelberg, especially as he had Felix Salmond for the solo 'cello, while Mengelberg was able to present only the first 'cellist of the orchestra as his soloist. Stokowski in his ninth concert laboured hard to give us an unusual programme. The Symphony was Chausson's B flat, heard at New York before, but never before so well played, and the beauties of the composition were never so well revealed as by Stokowski and his wonderful band. Of course any listener could easily understand that Chausson was a follower of Franck. The Symphony was preceded in the programme by Franck's 'Variations Symphoniques,' superbly played by Alfred Cortôt.

A Symphony in C minor written by an American, Daniel Gregory Mason, some ten years ago, was played about 1916 by Stokowski, at Philadelphia. Heard again, by the Philharmonic, under Stransky, in 1922, it was presented this winter by the New York Symphony under Bruno Walter's baton. Mr. Mason studied with d'Indy, and once more we are confronted with the influence of Franck, and recognise what good work can be done without a superfluity of themes.

When an American composer 'gets there,' and writes something that becomes an established favourite in concert programmes, it is a fact to dwell on as well as record. Deems Taylor's Suite, 'Through the Looking-Glass,' was first played by Damrosch two years ago, and met with immediate favour. Since then it has been played by almost every orchestra in the country, but it remained for Mengelberg to present it three days in succession to three different Philharmonic audiences, and to have the composer summoned to the platform over and over again, each time to receive such a roar of applause as has not been heard in Carnegie Hall for many a year. Nobody applauded longer or louder than Mengelberg himself, and truly the composition deserved all the commendation bestowed on it. Mr. Taylor depicts four pictures from Lewis Carroll's tale: (1) 'The Garden of Flowers,' when Alice talks to the flowers and they 'talk back'; (2) 'Jabberwocky,' describing the first appearance, battle, and death of the monster; (3) 'Looking-Glass Insects,' when Alice converses with insects instead of flowers; (4) 'The White Knight,' showing his exaggerated ideas of himself and what he really was. It is programme music of the best order, displaying wonderful workmanship besides revealing in every bar the charm of the music. Mr. Taylor was known for some years as a composer before he succeeded James Huneker as the music critic of the New York World.

If Mr. Gatti's novelties presented this last season had excelled or even equalled his revivals, it would be a wonderful winter's work to record, but with nothing superior to 'Jenufa' or 'Giovanni Gallurese' as novelties to write about, the glory belongs to 'Rheingold,' 'Götterdämmerung,' 'Falstaff,' 'Petrouchka,' and 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' The two last-named have come at the very end of the season, and cannot go the rounds of the subscribers, so a warm welcome should be awaiting them both in the répertoire of next winter. While, as a whole, the production of 'Petrouchka' did not at all equal that of the Ballet-Russe (seen at the Metropolitan nine years ago), yet in some respects it was superior. Its principal excellence was in the magnificence of the scenery and costumes. The colouring was superb, and M. Soudekine, who designed the scenery, deserves all the praise that can be lavished upon him. Unlimited praise can also be bestowed on the brilliance of the costumes, on the staging of Adolf Bolm, and on his performance of the hero. When Massine mimed Petrouchka, Bolm was the Moor, but he seems to be equally at home in either part. It would be idle to say that Rosina Galli's Ballerina was on a par with that of Lopokova, but it was well done, and if Bonfiglio as the Moor, and Serafin as conductor, did not quite come up to our ideals, we forgive everything for the sake of seeing and hearing that wonderful ballet again.

It is pleasant to write to our London readers that the best performances at New York of 'Petrouchka' in concert form, were given under the baton of Albert Coates.

TORONTO

When a musical season fails badly from point of attendance, it is usually the smaller attractions which suffer most. Seventy-five per cent. of the leading concerts here this winter have not even paid expenses, yet the Mendelssohn Choir Festival managed to secure a record attendance of over fourteen thousand, four of the five houses being sold out in advance. The critics seem to be unanimous in the opinion that there was noticeably a general broadening in the style of works chosen and in the readings given. Certainly the Philadelphia Orchestra has never played with finer sympathy or with more brilliant precision, either alone under Stokowski or when accompanying the Choir under Dr. Fricker. 'The Dream of Gerontius' performance is said to have eclipsed any previous choral achievement of its kind in the city. The assisting artists were Madame and Mr. Josef Lhevinne (pianoforte), Madame Nevada Van de Veer (contralto), Richard Crooks (tenor), and Walter Clapperton (bass), the vocalists appearing only in 'The Dream of Gerontius.'

This was the only extended work in the four choral programmes. The smaller choral works, which covered a wide range of style and period, included Pizzetti's Sanctus from the 'Requiem,' Holst's 'Ave Maria,' Rootham's The Twa Sisters,' Dunhill's 'Who is Sylvia?' and 'It was a lover and his lass,' Brahms's 'Gesang der Parzen,' Wesley's 'In exitu Israel,' Healey Willan's 'How they so softly rest,' Cornelius's 'The Surrender of the Soul,' the 'Cum Sancto Spiritu' from the B minor Mass, 'Zadok the Priest,' the Pastoral 'On some lines from Virgil,' by Roger-Ducasse, Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a northern land,' Brahms's 'Liebeslieder-Walzer,' and the Epilogue from 'The Golden Legend.' There was no madrigal in the list, the only Tudor work being Byrd's 'Ave Verum Corpus.' The orchestral afternoon included the Franck Symphony and a Bach Passacaglia, orchestrated by Stokowski.

In spite of the Mendelssohn Choir triumph, the New Symphony Orchestra has managed to secure two capacity audiences this month. At the ninth concert Mr. Ernest Seitz played the Brahms D minor Pianoforte Concerto, and at the tenth the most brilliant reading ever heard here of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D major was given by Cecilia Hansen, the beautiful and gifted Russian violinist who is so much to the fore on this continent. Five pianists of note have been heard in characteristic programmes—Rachmaninov, Brailovsky, Guiomar Novaes, Mark Hambourg, and Rosenthal, the last-named being the only disappointment. Brailovsky is carrying everything before him. Kreisler, Elman, and Cecilia Hansen have been our visiting recital violinists, the latter introducing a new work by L. Nicolaiev, of Leningrad Conservatory (Sonata in G minor). Freda Hempel unfortunately had not a powerful enough reputation here to secure a good audience for one of her charming programmes. The Women's Musical Club ended its season with Carlos Salzedo (harp).

Home talent performances have been in rather excessive numbers to ensure much success. Geza de Kresz departed from the normal in giving a powerful interpretation of the Bach E major Concerto for solo violin and strings at his first Hart House recital; Luigi von Kunits and Ernest Seitz were the soloists at the fourth Conservatory Sonata recital; Clement Hambourg made his début at the third Hambourg Concert Society performance; Reginald Stewart was given an enthusiastic reception at his farewell pianoforte recital before his departure for England; Maya de Cortez, a young Canadian soprano recently returned from Milan, showed good promise in her première; and interesting programmes were arranged by the Ukranian Choir (M. Krassin) and the Masonic Male Chorus (E. R. Bowles).

VIENNA

'THE IMAGE OF THE MADONNA' AT THE STAATSOPER

The composer who sets out to-day to write a grand opera infallibly hovers between the scylla of Wagnerism and the charybdis of the Italian verismo. On the whole it is beyond doubt that music as a descriptive art has played its rôle to the end. Programme music is a thing of the past with the progressive musician, and the return to absolute music has been ushered in by such leaders as Schönberg and Stravinsky in all their later compositions. The tendency towards abstraction which permeates art in all its branches has found its way into modern music as well. Opera, on the other hand, however 'irrational' and unreal as an art-form, still depends on visual impressions almost as much as upon acoustic effect. The reconciliation between abstraction and that measure of realism which the stage demands is as yet an unsolved problem. Hence the reluctant attitude of the young radicals towards grand opera as a species. Only two or three of them have ventured into the dramatic field, without, however, finding the solution of the problem.

Marco Frank, composer of 'The Image of the Madonna,' which was produced at the Vienna Staatsoper for the first time on any stage, cares little about ethical problems of this sort. With him, opera is a thing to proffer to the more or less primitive demands of the general public; thrilling stage situations, effective dramatic events accompanied by a music which is none too difficult, and apt to captivate the listener at first hearing. No more suitable background could be imagined for an opera of this description than the era of Italian renaissance, with its arresting tales of love and jealousy, its picturesque settings and gorgeous costumes. Renaissance operas have been en vogue for some ten years past. Frank follows the example of 'Mona Lisa' by Schillings, 'Violanta' by Korngold, 'The Florentine Tragedy' by Zemlinsky, and 'Die Gezeichneten' by Schreker.

Frank is a prominent member of the Volksoper orchestra. Innate memory, with its store of long orchestral functions and similarities of dramatic situation, may account for the frequent appearance in his opera of melodies and themes which are more or less akin to Wagner, Strauss, Puccini, and even Korngold. On the other hand, Frank's association with the mechanism of opera has taught him a very deft treatment of the orchestra, notwithstanding an occasional tendency to cover the voices of the singers. His invention is none too strong, but his sense for dramatic tension and passionate utterance—particularly in the second (and best) Act—is noteworthy. He weakens his cause, however, by frequent iteration of given themes, and by the loquaciousness of his dramatis personæ. In his technique he reverts to the recitative-like declamation and leitmotiv technique of Wagner.

The performance at the Staatsoper was excellent, especially for the wonderful portrayal which Carl Aagaard-Oestvig gave of the painter-hero.

NEW CONDUCTORS

The problem of a conductor for the Staatsoper is not fully solved. The engagement of Robert Heger, hitherto with the Munich Opera, has brought to the Staatsoper a skilled and circumspect leader, but not the great personality so urgently needed. The Philharmonic Orchestra, it appears, is also looking for a new conductor, for at the end of the current season Felix Weingartner retires from the post which he has held during sixteen consecutive years. In the light of Weingartner's proposed withdrawal, the appearance of Fritz Busch as conductor of the last Philharmonic concert assumed the character of a 'trial' performance. Busch, who holds the important position of general music-director at the Dresden Opera, is still a very young man, and an immensely energetic and concentrated conductor. His reading of Brahms's second Symphony was well balanced, and Reger's 'Mozart Variations' masterly in the transparency and grandeur of the closing fugue.

Georg Széll, who created a sensation as a pianistic boy prodigy here some fifteen years ago, returned to his native Vienna, after a prolonged absence, a finished and mature conductor. He brought out some attractive and interesting features in Richard Strauss's cinema music, 'Alpine'

Symphony, and proved his command of the classic style in Beethoven's eighth Symphony. It is deplorable that his home city offers no permanent opportunities for this gifted young musician, who has risen to a high rank at the Berlin Opera. Another conducting guest from Berlin was Heinz Unger, well-known in the German metropolis as an exponent and protagonist of modern music. Owing to the impossibility of obtaining the required number of rehearsals, Unger, like many visiting conductors, was obliged to limit his Vienna programme to a modern standard work, such as Mahler's first Symphony, which he imbued with the romantic and nervous element inherent in all Mahler's music. Few conductors have in recent years given us so authentic and congenial a reading of this Symphony.

NEW MUSIC

Following the 'Rite of Spring,' Stravinsky's 'Pulcinella' Suite has at last received its first hearing at Vienna. The concert of Cornelia Rider Possart, an American pianist, afforded the occasion, and Dr. Fritz Stiedry, director of the Volksoper, was the conductor of the evening. The response of the public exceeded all expectation, although few in the audience probably perceived more than the purely humorous character of what is, in fact, a revival of classic music through a genius of modern time, whose subtle wit and sense for orchestral colouring are nothing short of admirable.

Erno Rapee, a Hungarian conductor domiciled in America, gave a temperamental and intensely dramatic reading of Strauss's 'Hero's Life'—a piece of programme music, and, like the other novelty of the evening, John Alden Carpenter's 'Adventures in a Perambulator,' autobiographical in character. The explanatory text of the last-named piece—an infant's narrative of his daily little experiences—is more poetical and original than the music itself, which clings to the purely descriptive side of the subject and attempts to produce naïveté by the employment of a big, up-to-date orchestra. The godfathers of the baby Carpenter are apparently Strauss, Puccini, and, above all, Debussy.

In the minds of our concert-goers modern Norwegian music is almost exclusively associated with the name of Edvard Grieg. Johan Halvorsen and Gerhard Schjelderup have occasionally been heard in concert-halls outside of their native country, and a programme of contemporary Norwegian music comprising, as well as the two composers named, Alf Hurum, Arvid Kleven, Eyvind Alnaes, and Sverre Jordan—all names totally unknown here—was therefore anticipated with some interest. The feeling exhausted itself, however, in the course of the evening, as virtually all of the music heard followed the traditional paths of the German school, ranging from Mendelssohn to Schumann and Wagner, and adhered to the obsolete form of programme music. A symphonic poem by Hjalmar Borgstroem, entitled 'Hamlet,' and scored for pianoforte and orchestra, made no exception to this rule. The pianoforte is intended here, not as a solo instrument, but as part of the orchestral ensemble, yet the entire composition is more or less pianistic throughout. Like all other examples heard, it was simple, even naive music, free from modern ideas and the modern spirit.

A new Polish composer, Max Brand, was heard at one of the chamber orchestra concerts directed by Rudolf Nilius, with a 'Nachtmusik' (Op. 5). Brand is a former pupil of Franz Schreker, but the influence of Gustav Mahler is strongly noticeable in this composition. The second movement, with its humorous vein, serves as a contrast to the elegiac moods of the first and third movements, and elaborates, with some wit, upon the 'retreat' signal of the Austrian military—a motive quite in place in a 'Night Music,' and another recollection of Mahler, vide the first movement of his third Symphony.

PAUL BECHERT.

With news of extra 'detective' vigilance at the big stores during this sales season comes memory of the bad luck of a worthy when the lights went out in one of the establishments. 'There they were,' he lamented, 'having the time of their lives, pinching the things right and left. And where was I? In the grand piano department!'—Musical Courier.

UNVEILING OF MEMORIAL PLAQUE TO THE LATE PROF. FREDERICK M. NIECKS

At the last of the University of Edinburgh Historical concerts for the present season, held in the Music-Class Room in the University, on the evening of March 5, the beautiful memorial plaque subscribed by the friends and former pupils of the late Prof. Niecks, and executed by Dr. Otto Schlapp, was unveiled by his successor in the Reid Chair of Music, Prof. Donald F. Tovey. Previous to the ceremony, an eloquent and sympathetic oration was delivered by Emeritus-Prof. A. S. Pringle-Pattison, who took as his text, so to speak, the motto of General Reid, by whom the Chair was founded, 'Fortitudine et Labore.' This motto has naturally been, all through its history, associated with the professorship itself, and the orator remarked that the term 'Fortitudine' was singularly suited to the character of their dear and lamented friend. Valiancy had been his watch-word all through the hard struggle he had had to make a career for himself in his youth, and even after he came to Edinburgh he had had much uphill work in his efforts to build up the music school there. But he never wavered iu his purpose, and the results were apparent to all to-day. Prof. Pringle-Pattison also spoke of the wide general culture which was one of the outstanding factors in the make-up of Prof. Niecks. He then read the Latin inscription composed by Prof. Richmond, who holds the Chair of Humanities in the University, which has yet to be added to the plaque. The Latin inscription and a free translation made by Prof. Pringle-Pattison himself are subjoined. While the unveiling ceremony was in progress the Edinburgh String Quartet played the 'Cavatina' from Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 130. An interesting feature of the concert was the two Bach solos played on the organ by Mr. T. H. Collinson, who had taken part in the first of the Historical concerts, when they were originally inaugurated by Prof. Niecks over thirty years ago.

'Sacram memoriae Frederici Niecks, Mus.D., LL.D. hanc imaginis formam ab O. Schlapp amico caelatam dedicaverunt amici per quam musicarum rationum disciplinae rerum cognitioni musicarum provehendae vita omnis fortitudine et labore insigni dedita patenet.

MDCCCXLV.—MCMXXIV.'

'Dedicated by his Friends to the memory of FREDERICK NIECKS, Mus.D., LL.D.

This Cast, wrought by his friend, Otto Schlapp, commemorates a life signally brave and strenuous, wholly devoted to the furtherance of the Science of Music and the History of the Art in all its aspects.'

W. SAUNDERS.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

CHARLES CHILD, principal tenor at Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, in his fifty-fourth year. Born in Yorkshire, Mr. Child came to Oxford in 1892, and by an unusual combination of qualities made for himself a place there from which he exerted an influence on the musical life of the University and City out of all proportion to his position as a lay-clerk and to his own modest bearing. Both the Bishop of Oxford and the Dean of Christ Church in pulpit references spoke warmly of his attitude towards his ecclesiastical duties and the way he carried them out, and Dr. Ley cannot speak too highly of his efficiency and reliability alike in the rough places and the plain. His ability as a sight-reader was exceptional, and his knowledge of music unusually wide; he was, for example, familiar with all the Church cantatas of Bach. He had a voice somewhat similar in quality to that of Mr. Frank Mullings, though less robust; as a soloist he was always sincere and sensitive, and sometimes he surprised one by the vigour of his interpretations. But apart from his work at the Cathedral and as a teacher, his greatest achievements were the foundation of the West Oxford Vocal Society, which he successfully conducted for a number of years, and the formation of the Elizabethan Singers for the performance of madrigals and other vocal chamber music. He was associated with most operatic enterprises that took place at Oxford, including Sir Hugh Allen's pre-war productions of 'Fidelio' and 'Der Freischütz,' and he will be remembered by generations of Oxford men for his co-operation with the Bach Choirs and other bodies in the performance of oratorios, cantatas, and all manner of musical undertakings. He died of heart failure on March 16.

MARIE BREMA, at Manchester, on March 22. She was born at Liverpool, in 1856, of German-American parentage. Although her musical gifts were early shown, it was not until 1890 that she began to study singing, her teachers being Sir George Henschel, Madame Cox, and Alfred Blume. Her first public appearance seems to have been at a St. James's Hall 'Pop.' in 1891, and she achieved immediate success. Her ambitions, however, turned from the concert platform to the stage, and she made a successful début in a play by Henry Arthur Jones. It was almost inevitable that so unusual a combination of vocal and dramatic gifts should lead to the operatic stage, and she soon established herself as an operatic performer of the first rank, especially in Wagnerian rôles. In other directions one of her finest performances was that of the Angel in 'The Dream of Gerontius.' She made many successful appearances in musical festivals and on the concert platform. For some years before her death she had been teaching at the Royal Manchester College of Music.

JEAN DE RESZKE, on May 3, at Nice. He was born at Warsaw in 1850. His first appearance in this country was in 1874 as a member of Mapleson's Company at Drury Lane, under the name of de Reschi. He was then singing baritone. England lost sight of him for some years, and when he returned in 1887 it was as a tenor. His appearance in 'Aïda' at Drury Lane was the turning-point in his career, and placed him at once in the unrivalled position he held until his retirement in 1900. The later years of his life were passed in teaching—an art to which he brought all the skill and devotion that had made him so brilliantly successful as a singer.

[Elsewhere in this number Mr. Herman Klein gives some personal reminiscences of Marie Brema and Jean de Reszke.]

WILLIAM KAY, on March 26, in his eighty-first year. A former alto lay-clerk of Oxford Cathedral, he came to Oxford from the choir of Southwell Minster, to which he had gone from Sheffield, his birthplace, two years previously, at the age of eighteen. At Oxford he served under Dr. Corfe, Dr. Lloyd, Dr. Harwood, and Dr. Ley, and retired in November, 1913, after forty-six years' service. Of events and personalities of this long period he remembered Sir Frederick Ouseley as an undergraduate and afterwards as Professor of Music; he knew Sir John Stainer, Dr. Pusey, and Bishop Paget; he once played the violin in a quartet with the Prince Consort, and all his life was in request at Oxford as a viola player; in 1871 he sang in the choir at the Thanksgiving Service in St. Paul's Cathedral for the recovery of the Prince of Wales.

STELLA AUSTIN, at Wallingford, aged fifty-one. She was the wife of Mr. Ernest Austin, to whom we tender sincere sympathy, an expression in which we are sure our readers join.

Miscellaneous

PRESENTATION TO MR. HUGH BURRY

We are glad to hear that the long and self-denying service of Mr. Hugh Burry in the cause of music at Portsmouth has received public recognition. Mr. Burry was appointed hon. conductor of the local Philharmonic Society nearly twenty years ago, but he had already made his mark on the musical life of the town by some orchestral concerts at the Town Hall, with players drawn from the Queen's Hall and London Symphony Orchestras. Before going to Portsmouth he had formed and conducted the orchestra at Oxford House, Bethnal Green, an Institution well-known to-day for its musical activities. Under his direction the Portsmouth Philharmonic Society did fine work with performances of 'Gerontius,' Verdi's 'Requiem,' Berlioz's 'Faust,' Vaughan Williams's 'Sea' Symphony, the B minor Mass, the 'St. Matthew' Passion, &c. At a gathering in the Mayor's Banqueting Room at Portsmouth Town Hall recently, eulogies of Mr. Burry and his work in connection with the Philharmonic, the Competition Festival, and other local musical activities, were uttered by various prominent townsmen, and the Mayor presented him with a cheque and an album containing the names of subscribers.

Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society, now in its eighteenth season, has just given a capital concert performance of Verdi's 'Il Trovatore,' conducted by Mr. David M. Davis. The programme also included Mendelssohn's 'Son and Stranger' Overture and a chorus from 'King Olaf.'

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

WORRIED STUDENT.—You are doubtless handicapped to some extent in your pianoforte playing by the manual work you mention—using screw-drivers, spanners, &c., and carrying medium weights—though we have met with similar cases where by the use of correct methods quite a good standard of technique has been found possible. With regard to your miniature keyboard of an octave range, the keys of which are fitted with springs to give a considerable resistance to finger pressure, we should personally leave it severely alone. Also, if after nine months' diligent practice you 'still cannot "grasp" the music without carefully grinding out note values and intervals,' it might be advisable to reconsider your methods. Work systematically through some good sight-reading course. An excellent work is the 'Progressive Sight-Reading Series,' in four books, edited by Dr. C. Vincent (Winthrop Rogers), or Schafer's 'Sight-Reading Exercises,' in four books (Augener), may be recommended. Kunz's Canons would also prove helpful to you. They give practice in all the keys, and are widely varied in rhythm. You say you have been playing Tchaikovsky's 'Chanson Triste' in the key of B flat major. But isn't it in G minor? You will 'grasp' your music more quickly when you are less hazy on the subject of key. Finally, we would advise you to get Matthay's 'The Child's First Steps' (Joseph Williams). A careful study of this will show you if your technical methods are on sound lines.

WACKFORD SQUEERS.—We gather from your letter that you have little faith in any of the recognised methods of pianoforte playing, whether old or new. After quoting from Plaidy that 'not even the most talented can escape this thorough course' (i.e., of graded exercises, studies, and pieces), you go on to say that you are 'not in the slightest degree talented, but have passed the Associated Board's "Advanced" examination without any of this.' You are also apparently a sceptic on the subject of Mr. Matthay's teachings, and make the rash statement that in spite of the fact that the 'Act of Touch' was published twenty years ago 'the "empiric" method still universally subsists.' Do you seriously hold the view either that 'the world is still in ignorance of his revelations' or that 'it is still incredulous'? There are many teachers up and down the country who could tell you differently. The practice of exercises and studies is not, as you appear to think, inconsistent with Mr. Matthay's principles. By applying these principles, however, a great deal of needless, mechanical drudgery may be eliminated. When, therefore, you sit for the A.R.C.M. examination in Pianoforte Teaching you may with a clear conscience outline your 'course of instruction in technical exercises, studies, and pieces in five grades,' even though in the meantime you may have become a convert to the 'Matthay Method.'

WORRIED.—(1.) A falling off in the quality of tone may be due to many causes, and your best plan would be to take the instrument to a well-known repairer and have it thoroughly examined. It is not unusual, however, for new violins to deteriorate rapidly after a time without apparent reason. Sometimes there is no remedy; sometimes a rest of a few months will result in an improvement in the general condition of the instrument. Violins are delicate things, and it is possible that you have 'overworked' your Tassini—only the very best old violins can stand without strain the pressure of constant work. If deterioration has been very rapid it is possible that a slight readjustment of the sound-post may mend matters. (2.) You say that when cycling past a street-organ the pitch of the instrument flattens perceptibly at the exact moment of your passing; further, you have noticed the same effect in passing a cyclist who was ringing his bell. As you approach him you gather up his sound-waves more rapidly than he emits them—hence sharpness. As you recede, the opposite occurs: each wave has farther to go than the previous one to catch you, and they reach you in a slower series—hence flatness.

R. E. G.—The pieces you suggest as a means of introducing the boy to the classics will do very well. As his technique seems to be good, lead him to Bach via one or two of the most attractive of the dance movements from the Suites, e.g., the Gavotte and Musette from the G minor Suite; the ditto, ditto from the D minor 'English' Suite; almost any of the movements from the G major 'French' Suite; and a few movements from the '48'—the Prelude in G, Part 2; the C sharp major Prelude, Part 1; the E major, Part 1; the F sharp major, Part 1; and a Fugue of the lively sort, such as the two-part E minor; and the G major, Part 1. Among the modern pieces you would do well to include the Norwegian Songs and Dances of Grieg.

J. H. L., COCTEAU, AND OTHERS. — We cannot undertake to suggest metronome marks unless copies of the music are sent, or the works are of the stock type that can easily be referred to. Obviously we have not at hand all the pieces mentioned in the various syllabuses, and we cannot be expected to send N., S., E., and W. to collect them. Moreover, in many cases inquirers are under tuition. What are their teachers for, if not to advise them on such points? The pace of a movement usually reveals itself with study. Students should begin operations by trying to get at the style of a work, instead of waggling a metronome. They would then be rarely in doubt as to pace.

K. F.—Organ registration is a ticklish subject to teach, because the effect of a stop or combination of stops varies with the organ-builder, and with the acoustic properties of the church. It is thus impossible to make any definite recommendations, as can be done in regard to orchestration. Hence the scarcity of books—and even articles—on the subject. The only book known to us is Everett E. Truette's 'Organ Registration' (Winthrop Rogers, 12*s.* 6*d.*). It is very thorough-going, but you had better not adopt its suggestions too readily, as it is written with American instruments in view. Get at the author's principles, and test them on your own organ.

WESPELAER.—If your playing is 'tame' when accompanying yourself in musical sketches, the remedy seems to be two-fold: (1) an improvement in technique, and (2) a lot of practice in applying the technique while you are singing. The 'ornamentation' you ask about is largely a matter of composition. If you wish to add such decorative passages to your own or anybody else's pianoforte parts, you must examine plenty of models of the type that pleases you most. The well-known performer you wish to emulate got his slickness and facility by abundant practice. The only help we can give you is to advise you to take the same arduous course.

ALMA (Aston).—We cannot undertake to give lists of songs suitable for a particular voice or singer. Such choice can be made satisfactorily only by the singer himself or his teacher. In so large a city as Birmingham you ought to have no difficulty in consulting catalogues and trying-over songs by the composers you mention. And why not follow the reviews of new songs in this and other journals? You would then get, not merely a list, but a good deal of information about the style, degree of difficulty, &c. We devote a great deal of space to reviews in order to help readers in this way; you can hardly expect us to do the job over again in this column.

H. W. T.—It is unlikely—although not altogether impossible—that you possess unknown works of Tartini. At any rate, you can easily satisfy yourself on this point by consulting the 'Quellen Lexicon,' which gives a complete list of Tartini's works—not all of which, however, are easily obtainable now. The best-known Sonatas have been published over and over again in every country where music is printed, and edited by famous players—Alard, Joachim, &c. The Walsh family published in London in the 18th century. John Walsh senior began before 1696, and the business was carried on by his son (also named John), who died in 1766.

F. R. L.—You ask for a description of the form of (1) a modern part-song, and (2) a modern madrigal. The first varies so much that we could (but won't) fill a column about it. It may be anything from a simple piece, with a tune in the treble and three plain accompanying parts, to a complicated affair suggestive of the other form you ask about—the modern madrigal. The latter is often written in the old style, with numerous points of imitation, and a flavour of modality. Sometimes, however, a composer retains the name, but produces a work that is not so much a madrigal as a complex part-song. So much for formal distinctions!

FUGA.—(1.) The Reubke Sonata may be obtained from Novello's. We do not know the Haydn piece you mention, but no doubt Novello's could identify and supply it from your description. (2.) The Handel Concertos vary a great deal in difficulty. On the whole, we should say they would be rather less difficult than the Mendelssohn Sonatas. (3.) The 'College' about which you inquire is of the bogus variety. Burn its diploma, and set about getting one that is worth having.

SLAV.—Having undertaken to give a lecture on Dvorák, you must not expect us to provide you with the material. It's your lecture! Turn up the composer in 'Grove' and other books of reference. For illustrations take a couple of the Slavonic Dances for pianoforte duet, a group of songs (here you must choose for yourself, to suit your singers' capabilities), and one or two popular pieces for violin solo. As you have four vocal soloists, they might well combine in a quartet from one of the choral works.

GUIDA.—(1.) In the Heller piece, the octave B flat should be sustained by the pedal. We have not the music at hand, but we imagine that the figure 4 applies, not to the minim, but to the first note of the quaver phrase in the right hand. (2.) Play the chord in rapid arpeggio, beginning with left hand, the right taking over at the F on third line, bass stave; meanwhile the left crosses over and plays the treble D flat, the whole series of notes being played without a break, and with the sustaining pedal, of course.

M. L.—Surely the collection of two hundred ear-tests ought to give you all the practice you need! If not, get a friend to make up a lot more extempore. For the A.R.C.O. accompaniment test, the main requirement is ability to read at sight, plus a little taste and commonsense. No special preparation can be suggested, beyond testing yourself with all the examples given in the R.C.O. Kalendar. This will familiarise you with the style of playing required.

T. S. M.—The following moderately-difficult violin duets and trios will probably meet your requirements: Duos by Alard; Auber (Suite); Beriot; Dancla; Jansa. Trios for two violins and 'cello: Beethoven, Op. 25 and Op. 87; Haydn, Easy Trios; Mozart, Trio; Ries, Trios; and Wichtel, Three Trios. The publishers are various, and the price in some cases vary with the rate of exchange. All the above can be obtained through Novello's.

WOULD-BE CORTÔT.—It is to be feared that 'the considerable amount of stiffness' you complain of as a result of your early training on an American organ will not be easily got rid of so long as you are compelled to practise on a pianoforte with a very heavy touch. Change your pianoforte if possible, and meanwhile get Matthay's 'The Child's First Steps' (Joseph Williams) and study it carefully.

TRINITY.—We think your answer was inadequate. You merely described the passage, without explaining its construction. You should have pointed out that the second half was derived chiefly from the opening figure, F G B. Also that bar 2 may be regarded as having its origin in the same figure—quaver movement, a step of a second being followed by a leap. And you made no reference to the modulation to the dominant.

J. F. B.—(1.) We know of no literature dealing with mounted military bands. (2.) For musical kindergarten try 'Playways in Musical Education,' by Jeannie Murray MacBain (Evans, 3*s.* 6*d.*), and 'The Percussion Band,' by de Russette (Curwen, 2*s.* 6*d.*). Our fellow-journal, the School Music Review (Novello, monthly, 3*d.*), contains a good deal of matter that should be useful in this part of your work.

E. R. P.—(1.) The signs in the Jensen piece are ambiguous; they might mean either a slur or a tie. We do not know the piece, but judging from the extract you send the notes should be tied. The pace you suggest seems good. (2.) The signs in Scott's 'Water Wagtail' indicate arpeggio, though a wavy line is more usual. Crotchet 96 will do, but don't tie yourself down to a pace.

P. C.—You are a violinist of moderate ability, and anxious to join an amateur orchestral society in London. There are plenty of organizations which would be glad to have you, provided your attainments are not too moderate. Consult our 'Amateurs' Exchange': almost every month it contains earnest supplications for the help of folk such as you.

E. J. S.—The phrasing marks in Rheinberger's Sonatas are very erratic. For the subject of the B minor Fugue, that given for the first delivery of the subject seems to be the best; it should be used throughout, so far as the modifications of the subject permit. In any case, don't use the second version given in your letter. It would be bad to make a break after the E.

MELCOMBE.—(1.) Randegger's 'Singing' is published by Novello's (6*s.*). (2.) We know of no book on conducting a Church choir. (3.) Nor is there, so far as we are aware, a work on 'Elementary Orchestration.' The subject is one that can hardly be treated in an elementary way. Get any one of the standard works, and fish out such information as you want.

'WENGE' wants 'a good history of hymns and nymn-singing, or something akin.' We can think only of Mr. J. T. Lightwood's 'Hymn-Tunes and their Story' (Epworth Press, 6*s.*). John Curwen's delightful 'Studies in Worship Music' is out of print, unfortunately.

W. R. H.—Send the MS. to a publisher, and ask for an estimate of the cost of printing various quantities. But seeing that the piece is very short, and you want only a few copies, why not get a good copyist to do the job?

S.—We do not undertake the criticism of MS. compositions. Our contemporary, Musical News and Herald (24, Berners Street, W.1), has a department of the kind.

J. S.—Orlando Gibbons took the Mus. Bac. degree at Cambridge, and was also an Oxford Mus. Doc., the latter being honoris causa, apparently.

F. R.—In a reply to 'M. C.' in our January number we gave a longish piece of counsel on the starting of a singing class. Much of it will apply to your needs, we hope.

L. G. A.—'Don'ts for Organists' is a booklet by John Newton, published by Heffer & Sons, Cambridge, price 1*s.*

Can anybody help 'J. G. H.'? He asks for composer and publisher of 'a song called "Leeds Old Church," sometimes vaguely described as a Yorkshire folk-song.'

A correspondent inquires as to the title and publisher of an adaptation of the music of Gibbons's 'Silver Swan' to Fletcher's poem 'Drop, drop, slow tears.'

OLD ENGLISH
VIOLIN MUSIC

EDITED BY

ALFRED MOFFAT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

Although considerable attention has been given to the resuscitation of Church Music, Glees and Madrigals, Organ and even Harpsichord Music by the older English composers, very little has been done to make known the large mass of music for the Violin written by English musicians from the time of Purcell to the close of the 18th century. These works for the most part consist of Suites or Sonatas written for a solo violin with a figured bass, or for two violins and violoncello with a figured bass for the harpsichord or organ; another favourite form was the Concerto grosso.

It is with the object of making known to the public a selection of the best of these compositions that the present series has been undertaken. ALFRED MOFFAT.

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH

FOR CHORAL AND OPERATIC SOCIETIES.

Cuttings from Press Notices of the first Stage Presentation of the "Peasant" and "Coffee" Cantatas, Lyric Theatre, Glasgow, March, 1925.

"Skilfully adapted for stage presentation as well as for choral use. The gaiety, tunefulness, and unaffected charm of the lovely diatonic melodies and the clean, musical, self-enjoying effectiveness of the whole production made an immediate capture of the several audiences."—Musical Times.

"The arrangers have done a good bit of work in demonstrating that Bach on the stage is a practical proposition for amateurs."—Music Teacher.

"Endless flow of melody."—Glasgow Herald.

"These works are redolent of springtime and rustic joy and human kindliness."—Evening Times.

"Bach reveals himself not only as a melodist, but also as a genial humorist."—Evening Citizen.

Edited by ERNEST NEWMAN.

THE ORGAN WORKS OF BACH
BY HARVEY GRACE

Cloth, gilt, xviii. + 319 pages.
WITH OVER TWO HUNDRED MUSICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.
Price ... ... Nine Shillings net.

Extracts from MR. ERNEST NEWMAN'S Introduction.

"This is, I think, the first systematic and comprehensive English book on the Organ works of Bach."

"The prime value of Mr. Harvey Grace's book is that it appeals both to the organist and to the eager reader of organ works. . . ."

"It impresses the non-organist as the work of a man who sees his Bach in relation to all other music, ancient and modern. . . ."

"This is the book of a worshipper, but not of a blind worshipper. . . . Mr. Grace's frankness towards Bach's lapses inspires confidence in his judgment as a whole. No other book with which I am acquainted gives us so connected a picture of Bach as an organ composer."

"The student of musical technique, no less than the student of Bach, will learn a good deal from Mr. Grace's book."

FIVE SCOTTISH KELTIC SONGS

FOR CHORUS OF MIXED VOICES.

By JOHN FOULDS

OP. 70.

In this thoroughly distinctive series of part-songs Mr. John Foulds proceeds on the individual lines that he has so definitely established in his several well-known works of Keltic character. The music is concise, tuneful, peculiarly expressive of the Keltic idiom, and strongly contrasted, while the part-writing is vigorous, well-knit, and not in the least difficult to sing. When sung in their entirety, as the composer intended, the songs will make a most acceptable item in any concert programme containing choral numbers, the whole series of five occupying approximately twenty minutes in performance. Each number can also be given separately.

MARIO CASTELNUOVO-TEDESCO

SHAKESPEARE SONGS

VOLS. V. AND VI.

(EDITION CHESTER No. 128-9.)

Price ... ... each 3*s.* net.

VOL. V.

1. AUTOLYCUS—from "A Winter's Tale."
2. THE WILLOW—from "Othello."
3. ROUNDEL—from "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

VOL. VI.

1. APEMANTUS'S GRACE—from "Timon of Athens."
2. ARISE!—from "Cymbeline."
3. THE SOLDIER DRINKS—from "Othello."

The extraordinary success which the first four volumes of these settings of various lyrics from Shakespeare's dramatic works have enjoyed since their appearance, will doubtless ensure these new sets an immediate and equally great demand. They are certainly no less interesting and beautiful than the earlier examples, to which in fact they lend even greater variety by contrast. Not only is Mario Castelnuovo's treatment of the English verse irreproachable, which is in itself a remarkable feat for an Italian composer to perform, but he is obviously a keen and profound student of Shakespeare. Not content with treating these lyrics merely as the beautiful songs they are, he actually infuses into his music something of the atmosphere of the varied scenes from which they are taken. The Willow Song from "Othello," for instance, is charged with the tragedy of the last act, while the Roundel from the "Merry Wives" teems with the fantastic comedy of the final scene.

THE ART OF VOICE-TRAINING

SUMMER HOLIDAY COURSE IN LONDON.

MR. F. C. FIELD HYDE

Will conduct his HOLIDAY COURSE in LONDON from JULY 30th to AUGUST 8th.

It will include

LECTURES ON THE ART OF VOICE-TRAINING.

A CRITICAL REVIEW OF ALL THE CHIEF THEORIES OF VOICE-PRODUCTION.

LECTURES ON THE TEACHING OF SONG INTERPRETATION.

VOCAL AND PRACTICAL TEACHING ILLUSTRATIONS THROUGHOUT.

For Organists, Choirmasters, and all Vocal Teachers, this Course is unique. It is the outcome of many years' investigation of practically every theory and method worth investigating, and of a wide teaching experience.

Previous courses have been attended by Teachers, Conductors, and Organists, including musicians of national reputation. Their recommendation is unanimous.

The following are spontaneous expressions from letters received from those who have attended:

"One of the most enjoyable weeks I ever spent."
"The best holiday course of many I have attended."
"The improvement in my choir has been commented upon already." (Two weeks after the course).
"It has proved one of the best investments I ever made."
"A single lecture was worth the whole fee."
"I travelled a thousand miles to attend, and the course was worth it."
"I am returning to my work full of new ideas and fresh enthusiasm."

CAN YOU PLAY FROM MEMORY?

HOW insecure you feel if you cannot; what a handicap to your efficiency; what a discomfort to your hearers!

The pleasure of playing and of your listeners is increased a hundred-fold if you know that your memory can be relied upon with certainty.

If you can play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ from the music,

I GUARANTEE TO TEACH

you in a short Correspondence Course by the

to play from Memory with ease and accuracy.

My Booklet, sent free of cost or obligation, deals exhaustively, in non-technical language, with this fascinating subject.

Send a Post-Card to-day, stating which instrument you play.

PIANO PLAYING KEPT UP without keyboard practising

NOT the least of the many benefits which the use of my System confers upon pianists is that of being able to keep "in practice" without keyboard practising.

Even when circumstances render keyboard work impossible for several months, definite progress is often made in touch, increased powers of execution, and in general command over the keyboard.

This is one of the many reasons why pianists of all grades of proficiency take my Postal Course.

Many eminent musicians, including the late SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, have used and highly recommended my System—the ORIGINAL POSTAL SYSTEM. More than 19,000 Successful Students of all ages add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's System of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "LIGHT ON PIANOFORTE PLAYING," will gladly be sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in the System. When applying, please do not omit to state whether comparative beginner, average, or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.

M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQ., LONDON, W.C.1.

THE REAL USE of RELAXATION
AS APPLIED TO PIANOFORTE PLAYING.

AT all times of the utmost importance and interest to pianists, Relaxation has been the subject of considerable discussion in the Press and Musical circles.

There is no gainsaying the fact that THE CORRECT USE OF RELAXATION forms the pivot on which efficient technique revolves, although it is nevertheless a fact that many pianists still fail to realise its enormous possibilities.

THE CHARLES A. GILLETT COURSE OF 12 CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS SOLVES THE PROBLEM, and SHOWS YOU CLEARLY AND SIMPLY THE REAL USE OF RELAXATION IN EVERY PHASE OF TECHNIQUE, TOGETHER WITH ITS ACTUAL APPLICATION TO ALL PLAYING. The Course also includes POSTAL CONSULTATIONS on all individual difficulties.

READ WHAT OTHERS SAY.

A Teacher of the Piano writes:
"I have been a teacher of the piano for the last twelve years, and have taken lessons from expert teachers, but I have never seen nor heard the matter explained so plainly as you have done it; even a child could understand it."

An A.R.C.O. writes:
"Being a teacher of over twenty-five years' standing, and having tried every known system whereby Technique, Touch, and Tone could be improved, I can say without hesitation that IT IS THE FINEST SYSTEM I HAVE TRIED AND ONE THAT WILL ACCOMPLISH ALL YOU CLAIM FOR IT if the pupil will follow out instructions carefully."

Explanatory booklet with prospectus and testimonials will be sent post free to bona-fide inquirers. You are invited to call and discuss this teaching with Mr. Gillett.

THE TECHNIQUER
FOR STRETCH, STRENGTH, AND SUPPLENESS.

CARL WEBER, the renowned teacher says :

" After a trial, I find ' The Techniquer ' an admirable means of lessening the drudgery of a pianist's daily gymnastics. The exercises have the effect of strengthening the fingers to a remarkable degree, the result being that confidence and power are greatly increased, while effort is reduced and time saved. I recommend your excellent invention wherever I can, and with every confidence."

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

" The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, ' OPTIONAL OCTAVE ' contrivance, astonished me.

" I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.R.C.O.

Owing to increased output, we have reduced the price of our Popular Model to 14 guineas cash. Deferred payments if desired.

MISS MARJORIE HAYWARD writes:

"I have pleasure in saying that I think the 'Cathedral' Violin Strings the best and most reliable I have come across. For purity and richness of tone I do not think they can be beaten. I recommend them most warmly."

Miss Marjorie Hayward is in the very front rank of lady Violinists. She is a prize-winner of the Royal Academy, and passed through Professor Sevcik's renowned school at Prague. As an eminent instrumentalist she realises the importance of strings that can be depended upon for tone, responsiveness, truth of fifths, and certainty in harmonics. Hence her choice of "Cathedral" Strings. Use them on your instrument. They're the finest strings in the world—and guaranteed.

MAX REGER

BY ALEXANDER BRENT-SMITH

The musical career of Max Reger, though short, was remarkable for the good fortune which attended it. By the age of thirty-four, an age at which most composers are still struggling to get a publisher for anything more elaborate than a hymn-tune, he had about a hundred separate opus numbers in print. And when we remember the complexity of his scores, the phenomenon is still more remarkable.

From another point of view, the good fortune of Max Reger may be reckoned a catastrophe. To a young composer worldly success is an artistic disaster. Nearly every young man has to endure a series of rebuffs from which he learns that his prized masterpiece is too long or too elaborate for performance, and so with a heavy heart and trembling hand he sets to work to simplify that ostentatiously elaborate passage. Or it may be that owing to the impossibility of finding a publisher his work has to remain in manuscript, and that all copying has to be done by the composer himself because he is too poor to employ professional copyists. These experiences, though heart-breaking at the time, are invaluable to the young composer, because they compel him to discover the way to produce the maximum of expression with the minimum of notes, and it is remarkable how many notes appear superfluous when the problem of copying an orchestral work is presented to the composer-copyist.

Max Reger, fortunately or unfortunately, was spared these experiences, and his works quickly found publishers and, in Germany, performances. It also seemed likely at one time that a Max Reger cult was going to sweep through England. He himself gave chamber concerts in London, and charmed his audiences by the beauty of his pianoforte playing. A performance of his Hundredth Psalm was given at Queen's Hall. In conjunction with these performances, there appeared in a prominent journal a finely-written essay upon the merits of Max Reger, the writer comparing three great contemporary specimens of variation-writing, the 'Enigma Variations' of Elgar, the 'Don Quixote Variations' of Strauss, and the Bach Variations of Reger, and awarding the palm to Max Reger. That judgment, right or wrong, taken in conjunction with these well-advertised performances, did certainly suggest that Max Reger's day was at hand. But it was not to be, or, at least, not then. A few organists, greatly daring, attempted some of his organ music, and a few pianists attempted his larger pianoforte works. In spite of these spasmodic attempts to establish Max Reger, neither the public nor the few rallied to his cause.

There have been many attempts to establish other composers, such as Perosi, or Bruckner, which have proved just as ineffectual as this attempt to establish Reger, but the failure of Reger to profit by his boom is rather more difficult to explain—because he possessed just those qualities which win the admiration of the few and the good-will of the many. At his birth, a good fairy-godmother gave him the gift of melody, another good fairy-godmother gave him the gift of expression; but a wicked fairy-godmother (in fairy-tales, godfathers whether good or bad do not exist, a state of affairs which some real godfathers would gladly see in our mundane affairs—especially at Christmas time), well, this fairy-godmother maliciously gave him the power to exhaust his subject, thus destroying or partially destroying the value of the other gifts. Many of his songs are really beautiful, as are many of his little pianoforte pieces from 'Aus meinem Tagebuch' and from 'Childhood's Memories'; his larger works, however, in spite of great melodic beauties and titanic intellectual strength, have failed, so far as England is concerned, to win either the admiration of the student or the applause of the public.

This failure is due in a great measure to his unfortunate desire to say everything that there was to be said about any given subject—that is, he lacked the power of selection. There are, I suppose, a thousand things worth saying about every subject under the sun, but the wise man knows that all things that are worth saying must not be said. In a picture, a painter has to reject a thousand details for every one that he selects, although the other nine hundred and ninety-nine details are as true to life as is the one which he chooses. In the early days of the war Heath Robinson drew a fanciful picture of the Swiss frontier at the point where it touches the frontiers of France and Germany. In the Swiss portion of the picture a shepherd is piping, lambs are gambolling, and I expect (for memory is faulty) birds of antediluvian pattern are carolling in the sky. In the French and German portions lines of grim-faced men with pointed rifles are ranged opposite each other in perspectively converging lines, while in the air shells are bursting with visible vehemence and palpable din. Now most of those details were probably true, but yet their inclusion in one picture and their close juxtaposition makes the absurdity of the truth all the greater.

This in some measure is true of Max Reger. He says everything that can be said, and he exhausts his hearers long before he has exhausted his subject. Furthermore, he not only says all that is to be said about his subject, but he says all that is to be said about each successive harmony, thus leaving nothing to our imagination. There is a story told of Sydney Smith to the effect that in saying farewell to a friend setting out as a missionary to some cannibal islands, he added, 'Good-bye, my friend, I hope you'll agree with your parishioners.' Now that is an admirable and perennially amusing remark; but when a man repeating this anecdote, made Sydney Smith say, 'Good-bye, my friend, I hope you'll agree with your parishioners when they eat you,' he spoiled the whole thing in his desire to extract therefrom every particle of humour.

So, too, Max Reger, not content with giving us good tunes and hard-working, conscientious fugues, feels impelled to state all their merits, and in stating them destroys them. His melodies are choked with notes, and have little or no chance to live. He was like the little girl who was told to look after her baby brother and to keep him well wrapped up. True to her trust, this good little girl covered every visible part of her baby brother until the baby was breathless and herself brotherless. Even so did Max Reger nurse his music into the grave, thereby proving the truth of the adage, 'Care killed a cat.' Whenever he saw a crack in his counterpoint, he stuffed it up with two or three demisemiquavers; had a chord only four notes, he added two more; did a melody move in a single line, he instantly doubled it, and this even in organ music. Thus he stifled his ideas with too many notes, just as some ostentatious (and probably shoddy) jewellers crowd their windows with gold watches, silver watches, diamond rings, and pearl necklaces until we are bewildered into apathy, whereas the artistic jeweller limits the exhibits in his window to one pearl necklace on which we can gaze with covetous admiration.

The variations on a theme of Bach, to mention one of his greatest works, contains passages of exquisite beauty concealed beneath a tangled overgrowth of semi- and demisemiquavers. One or two passages in the work have a touch of that mystic, unearthly beauty which we associate with the music of Franck and Elgar, such as the harmonic phrase which opens the third variation, and another no less lovely passage in a similar mood which lies hidden in a block of demisemiquavers on page 17. These passages are difficult to find, not only because they are hidden in a wilderness of chromatics, but because Reger has concealed their tracks by throwing expression-marks all over the music.

This over-indulgence in expression-marks is not, however, peculiar to Reger, but is a symptom of so-called modernity. Most composers previously had been content to confine their use of expression-marks to the indication of arbitrary changes in time or force which could not be guessed by any one playing the music at sight. Without Handel's expression-marks no one could decide exactly how to interpret the 'Berenice' Minuet, though it is capable of many interpretations, all differing from each other but all equally satisfactory.

The old-time composers rightly considered that details of expression were unnecessary, arguing that anyone who was really sensitive to beauty would unerringly discover the right interpretation of their music, and that anyone who was not sensitive would never get the full meaning of the music however plentifully it was supplied with expression-marks. Thus they gave directions for the tempo and for the varying degrees of power, but they left the subtleties of expression to the player. Any real musician who studied Byrd's 'Pavane' or Bach's 'Chromatic Fantasia' would discover all the subtleties of their interpretations without a word of suggestion from the composers. In the 19th century composers began to use more detailed expression-marks, rather in the spirit of personal criticism than of helpful guidance. When Beethoven wrote con gran espress he meant that he thought the passage very beautiful and hoped the performer would think so too. Actually, of course, the performer may disagree with Beethoven's estimate of the music, or he may fail to plumb the depths of the gran espress. Since that date composers have gone still further in the matter of giving intimate details about the interpretation which they imagine their music deserves. They are like modern dramatists, who are not content with giving stage directions but feel obliged to reveal their own ideas about each person's appearance and manners, though it will probably happen that the play-writing in no way bears out the dramatist's own views about his characters. The Elizabethans were content to write 'Enter Ophelia,' knowing full well that it is no use stating her character unless she lives up to it in the play. But whereas Shakespeare says 'Enter Ophelia,' the modern dramatist would feel obliged to say:

> At this point Ophelia enters. She is a pretty, flaxen-haired young woman about thirty years of age, though she herself has given her age as seventeen ever since she was twenty-one. Her eyes, being light blue and large, seem for ever fixed in a gaze of perplexed interrogation; her lips, a crimson cupid's bow, seem fashioned to furnish life's most important answer; and so on, for a whole page of italics. Such elaborate stage directions, though they certainly reveal the attitude of the author towards his work, do not make the work one whit the better. Nor do expression-marks make music expressive.

When Beethoven does employ more intimate marks of expression such as con gran espress, we may be sure that it will be worth our while to play it carefully, but with Max Reger espressivos are as cheap as sprats and dolces two-a-penny. Every phrase of his work, however beautiful, turgid, or ugly it may be, is marked espressivo or con gran espress. Every line of counterpoint is marked ben marcato, so that a four-part fugue resembles a quartet of demagogues speaking simultaneously from a tub and urging the audience 'to listen most particularly to me.' This desire to make everything seem of the utmost significance is found in a certain type of journalism which shouts its message in capital letters or italics; which is not content with describing a thing as unique but as 'most unique' or 'most singular,' forgetting that if a thing is unique or singular it is unique or singular 'and there 's an end on't.'

Judging from these too frequent expression-marks it would appear that Reger's attitude to fugue writing, in spite of his phenomenal skill and sincerity, was entirely wrong. A fugue, if it is anything more than an intellectual exercise, should resemble a closely thought-out essay or sermon of which the value lies not in the text but in the subsequent ideas which spring naturally and logically from the initial idea. To Reger a fugue appeared not as a gradual unfolding of various musical truths which arise in connection with a given subject, but as a composition which writes itself without much trouble (and at great length) by the frequent introduction of the subject first in one part, then in another. Now this is obviously not the attitude of Beethoven, Handel, or Bach towards fugue writing. Beethoven rightly estimated the pros and cons of fugue writing when he said:

> To make a fugue requires no particular skill. . . . . but the Fancy wishes also to assert its privileges, and to-day a new and really poetical element must be introduced into the traditional form.

How different are Handel's counter-subjects from Reger's! How aptly they consort with their leaders, and how sympathetically they blend their widely different personalities! Examine Handel's choruses, such as 'And with His stripes,' 'Let all the angels of God,' 'Tremble guilt,' and notice how the counter-subjects are the perfect complement of the subject. Examine Bach's pianoforte or organ fugues, and notice how Fancy has asserted its privileges. Frequently it is difficult to decide which contrapuntal line of Bach is to take precedence, so full is each of great beauty and significance. I suppose that no two organists of equal taste would agree upon the correct registration of the great E minor Organ Fugue. It is so much a question of the mood at the moment. But Reger's contribution to Fugue, in spite of his earnestness and sincerity, was really a disservice to music, because he made Fugue appear just as artificial and crabbed as its detractors wrongly imagine it to be. His counter-subjects are not the marriage of true minds, of complementary melodies, but the mariage de convenance of very obliging semiquavers. Consider the Organ Fugue, Op. 57. The subject is promising, being full of vitality and character. Never did a fugue subject require a calm, restraining counter-subject more than this one, but does it find such a mate? Alas! no; the counter-subject is just as giddy and wild as the main subject, and, as we all could have foreseen, the marriage is a failure.

To Reger, as I have previously said, the primary interest of a fugue was its subject, consequently every entry of the subject is marked by such words as espress, dolce, dolcissimo, espress e sempre ben marcato il tema, sempre assai marcato il tema, or if all the parts are marked assai marcato, he requires the subject to be played marcatissimo, and then as a last resort, Italian being exhausted, he breaks into German. Nor is he content with German and Italian high explosives, but he must needs catch the pianist's eye by marking every part and every note with arrow-headed emphasis marks; some arrow-heads fly horizontally above the notes, and are evidently less dangerous than those which descend perpendicularly upon the stricken note. Even the poor little grace-notes—which are so shy that they scarcely show their heads among the mob of blustering semiquavers—are fitted with arrow-heads of a pattern suitable to their size and station.

This habit of Max Reger's of indulging in superlatives does not end in this ludicrous misuse of expression marks. All his music passes from extreme to extreme. The lady who went at one prance from Turkey to France was a giant sloth compared to Reger's emotions, which could pass from the extremes of pianissimo (pp was not counted of in those days) to a frenzied forte within a few notes—cf. the slow movement of the Violin Concerto. And in his opinion, anything which is being played as loud as possible can always be played one degree louder, and even then can be stimulated by the addition of a sforzando.

The result of all this passion for complete expression is that a page of Max Reger's music appears in constant mourning for its lost simplicity. I doubt if so many notes have ever congregated in one page as they do in the Symphonic Fantasy and Fugue, Op. 57. One pities the organist who tries to perform the work, but still more the unfortunate fellow who had to engrave it. I do not know what sale these works have, nor if any publishers are contemplating bringing out new editions; but if they are, I suggest that instead of printing the black notes upon white paper, they should print the white spaces between the notes upon black paper. I admit that this method may seem unusual, but I am sure that in the long run it would be much quicker and far less expensive.

ON MUSIC: INFERENCES AND INTUITIONS

By Mrs. Frank Liebich

Sir Oliver Lodge's remarks on the analogy of art and spirit, in one of his lectures on 'The Reality of the Unseen,' open out a wide region of thought on the illimitable subject of music. A picture, he said, was not in the material of which it was composed, but in the soul of the designer and in the soul of the perceiver. Everything we saw in the world of art was really in the mind. Probably we were surrounded by a number of things to which our eyes were not yet opened, and our condition was miserable and poverty-stricken compared with the reality of things. A dog might be present when music was played; he heard a noise, but he did not hear Beethoven.

On reading the report of the lecture in The Times, I asked myself, How many human beings are there, the whole world over, to whom the hearing of a Symphony by Beethoven, or any other composer, would be little else but noise, though duly qualified in many cases, perhaps, as a pleasant noise? And for musicians, in the world of sound, what marvels may there be of which those possessing the keenest perceptions are still unaware. The energy of an atom, surrounded by myriads of others, each revealed to be like the centre of a solar system, is not more inscrutable than the vital powers contained in the nebulæ of resonance of a musical note. The gradual education and development of the musical sense culminating in the perfect apprehension by the ear and mind of great musical works covers a far wider ground than that of the ordinary curriculum of academic training—for it leads into the regions of the mind where a kind of sixth sense is adumbrated. Artists in any branch must necessarily realise that the ever-increasing knowledge and love of an art grows with their growth, and can cease only when eyes and ears are closing to the sentient beauties of this world. And being aware of this, we know that our minds do not belong to the region of matter, but to what Sir Oliver calls the unseen region where reality reigns. We may have a complete comprehension of the science of harmony, instrumentation, of all that appertains to sound and the production of musical sound, and yet beyond all that intellectual experience of the art there lies a vast untrodden continent that only the spirit can explore. Once within its boundaries, the sheer joy of experiencing beauty will quicken our minds to a realisation of the mystery underlying all works of exceptional beauty—for they cannot always be classified according to laws. They have a definite existence of their own: an actuality which renders the expression contained in them unique. Benedetto Croce says:

> Every true work of art has violated some established class and upset the ideas of the critics, who have thus been obliged to enlarge the number of classes, until finally even this enlargement has proved too narrow, owing to the appearance of new works of art, which are naturally followed by new scandals, new upsettings, and new enlargements.

Again, if a thing of beauty is a joy for ever, increasing, as Keats said, in loveliness, and never passing into nothingness, by the simple fact of its immortality it partakes of the mysteriousness of eternity:

> Yes, in spite of all,
> Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
> From our dark spirits.

Among the things Keats enumerates that so affect us are 'all lovely tales that we have heard or read.' He does not mention music, but surely any great musical work is, in more senses than one, a tale. It is a personal narrative of the composer's adventures in the world of sound; a record of his imaginative passion and of his consequent thoughts and emotions expressed in sonorities and dynamics; a story of his perceptions of the interrelated beauties, affinities, and dissociations of harmonic combinations. It is a tale of love and devotion. And if the composer is a true lover of his art he will have instincts and intuitions as sure and sometimes surer than his scholarship.

A first hearing of any really great musical work is like a first meeting with one who later becomes a friend. To understand a personality we have to borrow a little of the actor's art and endeavour to imagine and realise something of the temperament and mind of the other. Similarly we must first experience a fine musical work by sympathetic hearing, and the successful experience and analysis of that experience is in the main what brings our understanding into close relation with it. Finally, it is by our whole and perfect realisation and not by any abstract analysis, that our complete appreciation of it depends.

'Les objets se transfigurent selon le magnétisme des personnes qui les approchent, toutes choses n'ayant d'autres signification, pour chacun, que celle que chacun peut leur prêter.' This saying of Villiers de Lisle Adam is particularly applicable to the hearing of a musical work, for it is made understandable to us by what our mind and personality bring to the audition. A certain amount of technical knowledge is necessary whereby the phraseology of a composition is rendered clear; then a sentient perception of the felicities of the mode of expression and of the picturesque variety of the themes and counter-themes of the older music; or of the subtle polyphonic texture, the nuances, the instrumental combinations, tone-colouring, and richly-coloured sonorities of much of the new. But underlying all this greater or lesser technical knowledge, our own personality must merge itself with the music. It must take possession of us, and we of it, so that when our knowledge and love is complete it becomes our inseparable possession. There are, necessarily, degrees of this mystic love and intimacy. There is a hierarchy of proficients and a vast community of votaries. But to the greatest and the humblest in both ranks the masterpieces of musical art will be a joy for ever, for their loveliness is ever present in the human minds that have stored the apprehension of them in their memories. Thus they no longer belong to the region of matter, but to the unseen region where reality reigns.

Yet we need variety, progress, novelty. We cannot stagnate in the past. Creative artists are round and about us as in all stages of the history of art. With some their hands may be faithless to their skill,* while others undoubtedly possess vision and the master-craft. By our apprehension of their shadowings of the ideal, they are aided further to fulfil our expectations, and to realise something of their own ambitions. Each successive century in virtue of its idiosyncrasies, its potentialities, its ineptitudes, its own special reasonableness, has reacted more or less on the mentality and art of its own brain-workers.

To reach the heart of a new society an artist must know something of its depths and shallows, its strength and weakness, its greatness and its smallness. But for the most part, and especially for a musician, these are only undercurrents to the main stream of his genius. The beauty that he will reveal will be his own individual adumbration of a reality transcending all that is extraneous. His work will then find ready listeners among the many pilgrims in search of the perfection of beauty. And though it will not fully satisfy each and all of these wanderers, many of them will, however, rest content for a while, having had a momentary glimpse of the object of their endless quest; for to look on the perfection of beauty face to face in this life would be little short of a calamity. It would imply quiescent satisfaction, immobility, stagnation. There would be an end of adventure in the sense of pursuing the unknown, of seeking the beauty that is beyond all beauty. Music in a manner inexpressible by words discloses something of this transcendent loveliness; it lays open depths of thought and feeling, and discovers within us that which had hitherto been unsuspected. It is more mysteriously beautiful and wonderful than any words, however perfectly chosen and arranged. But here I am held up. I hear a poet saying: If this were true, music would be greater than all the other arts, and no art is greater than the others. In music there is exactly the same mystery as in poetry, only expressed in a more rudimentary way than in poetry. Music is in fact a kind of elementary poetry. I retort: Poetry uses definite words; each has a distinct meaning; but tonalities, chords, concords, discords, have no literal meaning. And I am answered: Euclid, Herbert Spencer's philosophy, Colenso's Algebra, and Mr. Stanley Baldwin use words because of their definite meaning, and you get all they mean from their words, when they are silent, on paper; but poetry begins only when we are past the definite meaning of words. It is the mental association, atmosphere, and overtones of words (and especially of words in novel relations to each other) that constitute poetry, and these, as you say of music, 'speak a different message of beauty to each and every one.' And all that happens when one reads poetry to himself; but when it is spoken aloud by a properly trained voice it makes a more marvellous music than any composer has ever composed for singers: for in an octave of a singer's voice there are only thirteen intervals; if you divided each one into eight there would still be only a hundred and four intervals; but in an octave of a superb speaking voice the intervals are infinite, and music can never come near it. Thus the poet. He claims for his art the same infinitude and power of giving rein to the fancy and imagination as music. And it may be that no art is higher than any other. The human mind, aided by imagination and emotion, transmutes their different materials into what transcends experience, creating 'far other worlds and other seas' than our accustomed eyes and ears are cognisant of, each art in its maturity approximating towards 'the perfection of beauty' with which it has a common centre of radiation. Inferences and intuitions on such a vast subject as music are numberless. But, like flashlights, momentarily they illumine the mind only to reveal the reality of the distances of distance that are yet to be traversed and explored.

THE MALADY OF CHOPIN: A PIANIST'S STANDPOINT

By Erik Brewerton

It is one of the ironies of history that Chopin, who was the most aristocratic of men, is the most popular of composers. Without Chopin, a pianist might lose quite half his influence, and a teacher quite half his pupils. Chopin is the favourite composer of such different executants as Pachmann, Godowsky, Rosenthal, and Mark Hambourg! It is possible to obtain his complete pianoforte works in rolls for the piano-player. He has become the classic of the pianoforte, one above reproach, who can never do wrong, and whom not to like is regarded as an eccentricity.

It is natural that through this general and rather gross enthusiasm the composer's music should often suffer. To one scientifically interested in the problem, the number of different interpretations of his works must prove extremely interesting. It is doubtful whether the public has yet begun to discriminate over Chopin, to realise that there are at least two sides to his music, represented by the Valses, Nocturnes, Impromptus on the one hand, and by the Scherzos, Polonaises, and some of the Etudes on the other. It is doubtful whether any one pianist can do real justice to both these categories, or any one critic, or any one pianoforte. Where is the pianist able to play the A flat Polonaise and the A flat Impromptu equally well, or the Etude in A minor (Op. 25, No. 11) and the C sharp minor Valse? And if he can be found, where are the pianofortes to suit him?

Let it be said at once that Chopin is the most engaging of all pianoforte composers; that he is the most surely effective, the most fascinating and delightful; that, except in one or two of his last compositions and in such fragments as the second Prelude, he is all music; that his work presents an astonishing variety. Yet, perfect as he is, with a quality of perfection no other composer has achieved, he can create in the mind of the pianist who submits himself to him for long, an ultimate irritation. This irritation may be defined as a sense of disappointment that what promised so fair, what opened such vistas of beauty on first acquaintance, does not fulfil itself in at all a commensurate degree.

The attraction of such works as the first and third Ballades to the young pianist fortunate enough to come fresh to them can hardly be exaggerated, and yet after months or even years of assiduous practice he may play these pieces well and experience none the less a certain bitterness of disillusionment. The very necessity he is under to settle on one manner of presentation introduces an emphasis and a stiffness which rob him of those thrills with which he entered on his study. The stream of suggestions runs dry, and he is inclined to abandon his labours and to declare with a French poet that 'Action is a means of spoiling something.'

If, in distrust of his own technical powers, he hears great pianists play Chopin, their performances will bring him a similar cold douche of disappointment. This is as true of the smaller as of the greater works. Compared with his first acquaintance with the F sharp, the D flat, and the G major Nocturnes in the privacy of his own room, how ordinary they become in the public air of the concert-hall! This drooping of the wings, this fading of the colours, may be also observed in the A flat Impromptu and in the Berceuse, whilst 'The Black Key Study' which proved so fascinating when he first threaded his way through its intricacies, with familiarity grows almost blatant.

The fascination of Chopin may, indeed, lie largely in the fact that he never quite reveals himself, that he eludes you like a will o' the wisp with the intimation that you may catch him another time. This baffling reserve, this sense of the unsubstantial, are apparent in most of his chief works and account for the divergent ideas commentators have of them. To penetrate this reserve, to overcome this sense of the unsubstantial, the pianist may resort to storm and battery as in a Scherzo or Polonaise and almost succeed; or he may hope to insinuate himself into the secret through the shorter pieces until he comes across something bold and exceptional, as in the C minor Nocturne, which relentlessly checks his progress, and once more he fails. Sometimes the modern pianoforte seems too powerful for Chopin, at other times hardly powerful enough. Now, the desired tone is one of velvet, and yet later a crystalline clarity is demanded.

The aim the pianist has in these alarums and excursions is to reach a vantage-ground from which all Chopin's music can be adequately surveyed. Power without violence, delicacy without lack of firmness, rubato without loss of rhythm, brilliancy without hardness, the suggestive without the vague, the dramatic without the rhetorical—such are the tasks the Chopin player essays. They are very wearing.

How inviting is the opening of the third Ballade! And yet how elusive the music remains! After six months you are no nearer the realisation of the flattering promise originally extended. Even in Chopin's dramatic compositions, as in the A flat Polonaise and B flat minor Scherzo, there is still an invincible element of unreality, the flush of the dream world, the sense of a baseless if splendid fabric. One has only to think of such music and then of such a chorus as 'Sing unto God,' from Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus,' to catch a glimpse of the two worlds from which they emerge. Compared with Chopin, Beethoven's, Schubert's, and even Schumann's pianoforte works seem realistic.

To a stomach at all queasy a diet of Chopin can cloy if adhered to for long, and perhaps this is why Chopin for his own sake gave his pieces only occasionally to his pupils. The ear is acutely delighted, but the mind is tantalised and afflicted. Even the pleasure of the ear can be tinged with torture, in the pianist's attempt to capture on his instrument the tones that first sing in his mind. The listener is not conscious of this. So long as the performer does not show it in his face, like Pachmann, the listener hears only what is actually played. The charm and the torture for the performer lie in his anticipations of the sounds. Chopin's lure should address itself primarily to the tone-specialist, and a recital of his works should draw first all who 'tinker' at the pianoforte with some keenness of sensibility, and only secondly those who have a general liking for music.

Yet it is difficult to see how a Chopin recital, even from the hands of an acknowledged master, could afford pure pleasure to one already imbued with the spirit of the composer. He would be too sensitively strung. He would feel, in the measure of his capacity, only what Chopin himself would feel at such an ordeal. We do not read that Chopin played his own pieces much, nor have his pupils handed down the key to his original style. We read that he never played a Nocturne twice in the same way, which is not helpful information, and we can conclude that the brilliant performances of an Anton Rubinstein or of a Paderewski would leave him cold. If he returned to life only a few self-confident ladies would willingly play his music to him, and he would find us all far too emphatic.

A long subjugation to this highly-wrought and sensuous music produces an excessive æstheticism which finds Schubert naïve, Schumann clumsy, Beethoven rough, and Mendelssohn insipid. Chopin tends to exclude other composers as Wagner does, and the claims we grant with abandonment may in the end prove irksome and onerous. This constant effort to attune sensibility to the exquisite note demanded by the composer, this devotion to a voluptuous beauty at the expense of a beauty more rational and calm, this combination of a delicately poised and nervously alert technique, this ceaseless battery on the nerves, what effect can such music have on a pianist capable of reacting to it but a deleterious effect? Or, rather, not on the pianist, but on the man—for here possibly lies the root of the matter.

With no other composer can the exclusive demand for beauty find such gratification. No composer is so purely refined, none so likely to ravish the homage of all who think that the whole duty of the artist is to be artistic. But it is doubtful if an interpretation of life in terms of beauty will ever quite satisfy even the artists themselves who suggest it. So many things have to be left out, so many instincts ignored. All dictatorial, all oppressive art will inspire an ultimate resentment, all art that has not a certain leaven of mildness, modesty, and candour. What is it which prevents this true genius from being really simple, except perhaps in a few of the Mazurkas?—the part of his work which is so little in general favour as to justify the conclusion that it is not deeply characteristic of the composer. One might ask the same question of Liszt if one could be sure that as a composer he was a true genius. Can it be that to the fastidious Chopin some secret was withheld which was revealed to the bourgeois Schubert; and can this have happened precisely because the one was fastidious and lived in salons and the other was bourgeois and drank beer?

FRENCH COMPOSERS: WITH A NOTE ON MAURICE RAVEL'S LATEST WORK

By Scott Goddard

It is no longer to be doubted that the time has come when the attention of musicians which has been so long focussed on things French is being turned elsewhere. The change has taken place so gently as to be almost imperceptible. It will certainly remain incomprehensible to the sectional musician for some time to come. But the fact remains that Paris has ceased to be in the vanguard of musical evolution. It has given up that place which it so clearly seemed to hold at the time of the Versailles Treaty. Since then the music that has come from Paris—with the exception of what Stravinsky, who is not very French, has put forth—has shown a pre-occupation with questions of style, with the perfection and elaboration of what has already been attained, but not at all with fresh endeavour. It is not as yet easy to see where the forward movement in music will most definitely show itself. Possibly in Spain, where de Falla continues to strengthen his position as a poetic craftsman. More probably among the Austrians, who acknowledge Schönberg as their source of inspiration. But wherever it goes, it has already left France, and the time is not far distant when a critical survey may be made of the achievements of the Parisian school (or schools) of composition.

Within the last few months two outstanding and widely-different examples of modern French music have been heard in London. One of them is in connection with the season of ballet that M. Diaghilev produced at the Coliseum when 'Le Train Bleu,' by Darius Milhaud, was given. The other important occurrence is the first performance for many years in this country of Vincent d'Indy's Pianoforte Sonata in E minor, by Mr. Angus Morrison at Wigmore Hall on January 12 last. Between these two aspects of modern French music a gulf is fixed. The distance between the two is greater than that which exists between Ravel, to take a single instance, and either of them. For it is undeniable that if M. Cocteau, the spokesman of the young group, just delicately sneers at Ravel and his work, he ignores d'Indy and his output altogether as being negligible in their effect upon the onward march of French music. And, conversely, if d'Indy holds out the hand of friendship to Ravel with a dignified condescension, he will have nothing to do with these younger people or with their Maître d'Auteuil, M. Satie. And thus the chasm widens year by year, work by work.

All d'Indy's predilections start from the point where César Franck placed him during the years in which he learnt from that master. Added to this there is the vieille noblesse of his ancestry which fitted him for the romantic classicism of Franck and his circle. He underwent that schooling to the utmost extent of his, and of its, powers; wrote a remarkable reminiscent, critical biography of his master; and now—head of the Schola Cantorum that he and Charles Bordes founded, itself a tangent from the Franck circle—sustains the position of leader of the classicist section of French composers.

The Pianoforte Sonata in E minor is classical in shape: its economy of material is very stern. Two themes dominate the whole work. They are the germ from which springs every melodic outline that appears as the work goes forward. This economy is managed with great subtlety. The common relationship is never so insisted upon as to become obvious. At the opening a theme and four variations are combined into what approximates closely to the form of the first movement of a classical sonata. The last movement of the three passes in review the thematic material of the preceding ones. As might be expected, the strongest influence that is felt in this work is that of César Franck. In shape of phrase, in technique of pianoforte writing, in many moments of lofty expressiveness, Franck's example is the motive force. From this affinity d'Indy goes forward, however, farther than Franck ever dreamed of going. He is less detached, spiritually, than his master, and is awake to sensations more mundane. Franck studied fairly deeply, or, at least, read far, into Beethoven, and in passing on to his pupils the result of that attachment, transformed the Beethovenic ideas and ideals into something quite other than those Beethoven himself stood for. In Franck the late Beethoven found a resting-place that was all softness and suavity, where angularity was rounded off and roughness planed down. The curious thing is, however, that without the later Beethoven Franck could not have written his pianoforte pieces as they now stand, and that the influence, though so tempered, is still so strong. D'Indy seems, for once, to have been chary of accepting his master's readings of Beethoven, and to have gone himself to the original source. There he has found more than Franck ever allowed for, and in this Sonata the influence of Beethoven, enlarging the bounds of form and procedure, making use of the virtuosity of the pianoforte in a ruthlessly masterful way, surpasses the less virile methods of the Franck school. To the ample design of Beethoven and the graceful phrases of Franck, other influences are joined. The work is, in fact, a historian's composition. Now it is the rhythm of the Russian composers, now the harmonies of Debussy. The work as a whole is a massive conglomeration of affinities, a comprehensive oversight of the attainments of the last hundred years or more. And yet when all this has been said, there remains over sufficient vitality in the conception, enough personality in the workmanship of phrases and movements, to give the work a reasonable existence of its own apart from questions of extraneous sources of inspiration. Above all, the Sonata is deeply and sincerely felt. It is also very soundly constructed. It will hardly appeal at first hearing even to the most receptive audience. There is a terse severity surrounding its melodies, and there is not much in it that pleases instantaneously. Familiarity with the score brings to light an increasing number of examples of fine thought and delicate appreciation of the values of tone and line.

The Sonata can be placed with Ravel's 'Gaspard de la Nuit' (written in 1908, a year later than d'Indy's work) as one of the highest achievements of contemporary French pianoforte music. The differences between the two works are obvious. The things expressed, and the method of their expression, are both dissimilar. The works are alike in the way in which they both succeed in doing things on the pianoforte that could not have been done with the same amount of effectiveness on any other instrument or combination of instruments. They are pure pianoforte music, both slightly tinged with the influence of Liszt's technique of pianoforte playing. A comparison of the two compositions instantly reveals divergence of outlook, but shows as clearly the perfection of form that French music always possesses, strengthened by a depth of meaning that is perhaps more unusual.

Between d'Indy and the 'École d'Auteuil' there stands the now solitary figure of Ravel. In the retirement of a country existence Ravel pursues with undisturbed composure a way that is hidden from all. Having early been exalted into a sort of enfant terrible of his art, he has now come to be considered a kind of Don Quixote. (In this signification it may be allowed to consider M. Roland Manuel as his Sancho Panza.) Suspected alike by the classicists and by the younger groups, uneasily acknowledged to be yet as full of vitality as ever, he occupies a position above the battle. From time to time he throws out a fresh work to be worried at by the opposing factions.

He is as difficult to label as ever. It is as impossible as ever it was to foresee his next move. He does not shrink from holding the view that it is not needful to hold any view at all. It may even be that he does not clearly see whither he is going or what his goal is. In that case he would assuredly be the first to plead guilty to the charge. He shares with Schönberg this gift of the tentative explorer's humble-mindedness. None the less it can hardly be said with justification that because of this uncertainty he will not go ahead of the point that he has already reached. His purely technical gifts are undeniably serviceable. The road he is travelling seems to be an arduous and circuitous one. In the meantime, while the 'École d'Auteuil' feels itself superior to him, he removes himself ever farther away from it and what it stands for. It is probable that he it is who will effect a junction between the Parisian and Viennese idioms. Already in the Duet Sonata (for violin and 'cello) he seems to be directing his work towards that point.

Maurice Ravel's latest work, produced at Monte Carlo in March, is a 'Lyric Fantasy' in two parts with no break between. The libretto is by Colette, the authoress who has made it her aim to interpret the state of mind of animals, giving them an almost human impress. At the same time she seems to have tinged her really human characters, such as Claudine in 'La Retraite Sentimentale' and Renée in 'La Vagabonde,' with a curious and disquieting animalism. In this little play which Ravel has set, 'L'Enfant et les Sortilèges' ('The Child and the Enchantment'), Colette has taken animals for the larger number of characters. And though the child is certainly a little beast, he is a 'beast' in the school-boy sense of the word, not at all an animal like Colette's other heroes and heroines.

The play represents the chastisement and eventual repentance of this beastly little boy, who has always delighted in pulling the wings off flies, pinning live dragon-flies to the wall, pulling the cat's tail, poking the caged squirrel with a pin, and cruelly annoying all that surround him. The scene opens with the entry of his Mother into the nursery, and his refusal to 'be a good boy.' She leaves him with his punishment-rations, and he exults in his naughtiness, pouring water on the fire, slashing the hangings with the poker, until suddenly the old easy-chair starts to move across the room and, to the child's horror and amazement, starts a colloquy and dance with the little Louis XV. chair. The two tell each other of the bad treatment they have received at the hands of the horrid little boy, and in turn the other pieces of furniture move and talk, all vowing vengeance. The pieces of torn tapestry rise up, and the figures of shepherds and shepherdesses dance sadly. The torn fragments of a picture-book stir, and from out of the midst of them there comes a Fairy Princess who mourns her broken life. The child goes to the fire, in his fright. The fire spits at him. The cats come in and make love before his eyes. He finds himself in the garden (the second part of the opera), and hears the tree moan over its bleeding bark cut by a knife. The animals threaten him—bats, owls, squirrels. (It is like the scene in the forest in Kenneth Grahame's 'Wind in the Willows,' where the animals get lost in the winter dark.) Suddenly all the enraged beasts fall on the child and start rending him. In the fight he manages to creep to a corner, and there finds a little squirrel with a wounded paw. He has a moment in which to attempt to bind up the wound before he faints away. The animals are filled with consternation. They bear him to the house. His mother comes out just as he awakens, and the curtain falls as he cries out 'Maman!'

Such a tale should make a good opera. It is sufficiently far-fetched for operatic presentation. There is no straining after an impossible realism. The whole thing is so frankly make-believe that all the operatic conventions can be accepted without hindrance. Ravel has filled the score with lovely music. All the little dances are distinctly characterised. The harmonic colouring is very varied. The rhythmic basis is ever-changing, there being such unusual measures as a 'Valse Américaine' and a kind of music-hall-song Fox-trot, which are balanced by an old French dance for pipes and tabors. There is much fine coloratura for 'Fire' and for the 'Nightingale.' And the whole work ends with a piece of delicate choral writing in the style of 'Ma Mère l'Oye,' as finely expressed as anything Ravel has done. In the score there are pages which show a certain likeness to the methods of the Duet Sonata. The rhythms of 'La Valse' are used with more rapid modifications and with increasing effect.

Of the orchestration there is as yet no chance to judge, though this may be taken for granted as adequate, it being the one province of the art in which even those who can see no good in him as regards general ability as a composer agree that Ravel never fails.

The circle of young composers that is at present most acceptable to the general public consists of those who at first were placed together under the misleading title of 'Les Six,' and now are labelled as the 'École d'Auteuil,' a designation as vague as the former one. Certainly M. Satie does live at Auteuil, and it is of course to him that MM. Poulenc and Auric owe the definition of their undoubted talent. The simplicity that M. Satie shows forth in his compositions is upheld by these young composers. Each of their works reaffirms this attitude. It is too early to say whether this return to a pre-Bach simplicity is more than mere attitudinising. After all, not a few great movements in art started in some such way. Time must be allowed these young Frenchmen in order that they may show more fully the amount of truth that is in them. They may also be able at the same time to show how much there ever has been in M. Satie.

The Aberystwyth Musical Festival, which takes place on June 26, 27, 28, and 29, promises to be an interesting event. Modern writers will be represented by works from the pen of Gustav Holst ('St. Paul's' Suite and Ballet music from 'The Perfect Fool'), Vaughan Williams ('Pastoral Symphony' and Mass in G minor), Coleridge-Taylor ('Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast'), Rimsky-Korsakov (Sinfonietta), Sinigaglia ('Le Baruffe Chiozotte'), and Delius ('On hearing the first Cuckoo in Spring'). The conductors will be Dr. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Gustav Holst, Dr. Adrian C. Boult, Dr. David de Lloyd, Sir Hugh Allen, and Sir Walford Davies. Welsh choral items will be included in the programme, and on Sunday evening a singing festival will take place.

LISZT'S 'DANTE' SYMPHONY AND TONE-POEMS

By M.-D. Calvocoressi

There can be no question that the 'Dante' Symphony ranks foremost, together with the 'Faust' Symphony, among Liszt's orchestral works. I must confess to being even fonder of the 'Dante' Symphony than of the 'Faust' Symphony. I find it more compact in texture; I find the interest more sustained and more evenly distributed throughout, as regards the ideas and their treatment.

The most remarkable feature of the first movement is its extraordinary vehemence. The music grips the listener at once, and holds him spell-bound until the end. The form may be described, roughly, as that of a triptych: for there is a middle section, lyrical and tender in character—it is inspired by the episode of Paolo and Francesca—that stands in strong contrast with the seething turmoil of the first and third sections. But apart from the relief which this contrast affords, the music does not lag a single instant, nor give the listener breathing space.

There is a good deal of insistent repetition, but it is never felt that Liszt is repeating himself otiosely. The hypercritical reader of the score—though not, I believe, the listener—may perhaps make an exception in the case of a few bars (seventeen in all) in the Andante Amoroso of the middle section, which it is possible, à la rigueur, to cut if one considers things from the purely formal point of view, at the expense of the psychological. But apart from that the pace is sustained and the substance never thins out.

Another noteworthy point is that the dramatic grandeur is marred by no single trace of histrionic, melodramatic over-emphasis. There is no single instance of meretricious facility. And a third point is the perfect homogeneity and compactness of the texture. Although a reading of the score may suggest that Liszt indulges too freely in purely chromatic patterns and trains of diminished sevenths, the music does not ramble nor convey the impression of holding together loosely or precariously. Here is a purely chromatic theme from the introduction in the first section:

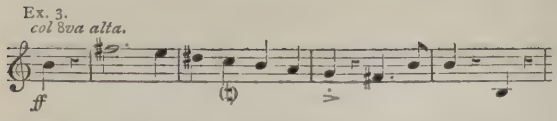
Ex. 1.

It is just the kind of thing which, used as extensively as it happens to be, might lead to a mere see-saw or turning in a circle. But nothing of the kind occurs.

The other two main themes of the first sections are:

Ex. 2.

Ex. 3.



The first is put to a variety of uses, the second is always restated without alteration.

In the transition to the middle section, the first new thing to occur is the following beautiful recitative in the bass clarinet:

Ex. 4.

The same tender mood, first dreamy, later more exalted, prevails until the end of the section, when a wonderfully impressive transition reintroduces the atmosphere of awe and strife; and from this point the movement storms to its end without a moment's respite.

With regard to the 'Inferno' music, I must reveal the fact (which possibly will strike a few readers as curious, and will be taken, maybe, by others as a token of sheer 'contrariness') that despite the awesome and depressing theme which inspired it, and its very graphic and telling illustrative quality, it conveys to me a potent feeling of exhilaration. So much for 'programmes' and the connection between them and the facts of the music!

The first theme of the second movement:

is introduced by the oboe. Its atmosphere is one of gravity and meditation. Longing is expressed beneath the calm surface, and eventually this expression is more poignantly asserted. It is upon this recurring contrast that the movement is built so as to lead up to a climax, which in turn serves to introduce the admirable choral Magnificat which brings the work to its conclusion. I shall attempt no closer description. All I wish to add is that it is most deplorable that the present generation of music-lovers should never get a chance of hearing this masterpiece in this country (nor can it be procured in gramophone record or in player-roll form).

More or less the same applies to certain of Liszt's best tone-poems. As to which are the best, perhaps no two judges will agree—although there is a fairly widespread tendency to give the first place to 'Orpheus.'

Even richer in pregnant originality and more forcible in their eloquence are, to my mind, 'Héroïde Funèbre,' 'Hungaria,' and 'Hamlet.' 'Mazeppa' I consider very brilliant and telling. 'Festklänge' is almost as effective, and contains some lovely music. I should certainly wish those six to be known to all music-lovers. 'Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne' and 'Die Ideale' are interesting in more respects than one, but somewhat longdrawn and loose. I should not include them in a list of the very best things by Liszt. And it may be remembered that my suggestion is that for a time we should concentrate on Liszt's best only.

For the same reason, I think 'Les Préludes' might be given a rest. The two tone-poems by Liszt which I consider weakest are 'Tasso' and 'Die Hunnenschlacht.'

There is a splendid thing by Liszt, 'Der Nächtliche Zug,' the first of the 'Episodes from Lenau's "Faust,"' which appears to be altogether unknown here, although some people are acquainted with its brilliant companion, the 'Mephisto Waltz.' The catalogue is not complete, but may be left at that. I am not unaware that as it stands it may dissatisfy certain of Liszt's admirers as well as detractors. Some people will disapprove of 'Tasso' and the 'Hunnenschlacht' being held cheap (indeed I happen to know, for instance, that M. Ansermet, who is not only a splendid conductor, but an alert and discerning judge of music, holds the last-named work in high esteem), as surely as others may not understand praise being found, say, for 'Hamlet' or for the 'Totentanz.' I have already had many experiences of the kind. However, such are—for better or for worse—the suggestions which I have to make with regard to Liszt's main orchestral works. As regards Liszt's admirers, the position may be summed up in the phrase Quot capita, tot census—a fact whose moral (not quite that which might be expected on the face of it) I shall attempt to bring out by way of conclusion in my next (and for the time being my last) article on Liszt.

My attention has been called to the fact that in the first of this series (see Musical Times, January, 1925) my free criticism of the author (whom I named) of a certain primer for his wholesale strictures of Liszt seemed to imply criticism of the author (whom I did not name) of another primer. I wish to state that at the time of writing the article I had not read the primer in question—which is Sir Henry Hadow's 'Music' in the 'Home University Library of Modern Knowledge.' But had I read it I would have made exactly the same point, although I am quite aware that having so eminent an authority and so sapient a judge on their side may well inspire Liszt's detractors with fresh confidence. The point is merely one of principle, viz., that so long as reasonably competent judges disagree with regard to a certain composer's merits or demerits, it is desirable, and only fair, that educational primers on the one hand and works of reference such as musical dictionaries on the other should not present the case as finally settled. That such disagreement exists in Liszt's case is, I think, quite obvious. Therefore I should have made the point, had the occasion arisen, even if I disliked Liszt's music as much as I love it.

Ad Libitum

BY 'FESTE'

'At the Boar's Head' has rent the critical world as few recent novelties have done. When we do disagree . . . .

I was present at the second of the Golders Green performances, and as a result I am convinced that it is a first-rate little work. The exactly opposite view expressed by some respected confrères would impress me more if it were not generally based on the opinion that the performances have been adequate. This is where we part company. At the performance I attended, a good deal of the text was not audible, simply because the singers' diction was unequal to the task. (But I hasten to pay tribute to Mr. Norman Allin, who set a splendid standard in this, as in other vocal matters.) The part of the Prince was practically not there; Mr. Tudor Davies may be forgiven for not 'looking' the part, but he can hardly be absolved for singing it in a manner that suggested an amorous Italian rather than a young Englishman who was 'a bit of a lad.' Hence a complete misfire in the soliloquy 'I know you all.' The company generally showed an inability (or a reluctance) to remain static without being stiff, and some of the comic business was overdone, e.g., the cuddling of Falstaff and Doll and the bibulousness of the latter. (Otherwise Doll gave us some of the best singing and acting of the evening.) But the chief flaw in the performance was the complete misunderstanding (or was it deliberate disregard?) of the composer's plain indications concerning the quintet. I have not the score at hand, but I think I am right in saying that when the Prince begins the sonnet, 'Devouring Time,' Falstaff is supposed to show disapproval of the song (which is natural enough, for it was not the kind of ditty he would be likely to care about!). He makes this disapproval active by breaking in with the ballad 'When Arthur first'; Doll places her hand over his mouth, but he continues the ballad sotto voce against the Prince's song. Later, Poins and the Hostess add descants to this, but the score indicates that the Prince's voice is to stand out above both ballad and descant. In other words, the whole of this section is a tenor solo with quiet vocal accompaniment. Moreover, it is a serious and beautiful piece of polyphonic writing. What did the singers make of it? To begin with, the Prince sang his part, not from memory, but from what looked suspiciously like a set of proof-sheets strung together at one corner; he sang it at Falstaff, who showed his lack of appreciation by pawing the air; the more he pawed, the more the Prince threw the Sonnet at him, thus from the start introducing an element of low comedy; Falstaff's ballad soon got too loud; Poins and the Hostess, instead of adding subsidiary parts, rapidly developed into principals; and long before the end was reached, the whole party was singing violently against one another. Nobody won; everybody lost—above all, the composer. Worse still, the quintet, instead of being recognisable as a serious moment (and therefore an important contrasting element in the whole scheme) was regarded as a piece of musical clowning. I heard many titters round me from people who clearly accepted it as one of the funniest bits in the work. Yet, in the face of all this, we are told by one responsible critic that the performance was 'a very good one,' and by another, that the B.N.O.C. has 'nothing to learn' in regard to the presentation of the work! One cannot but speculate as to the extent of the writers' acquaintance with the score.

If this work of Holst's fails to hit the mark (as the weight of critical opinion seems to foreshadow), the fault will lie at various doors. Perhaps the composer is primarily to blame for over-rating the literary taste and the intelligence and adaptability of the operatic public.

In his simple, trustful way, he imagined that English folk would have a good general acquaintance with Shakespeare in the lump, and would know the plummy bits pretty well by heart. Of all these bits, the Boar's Head episodes are among the plummiest, yet somehow a large proportion of the alleged educated class has not so far found time to read them. The member of the Golder's Green audience who announced, coram publico, that he was demned if he knew what it was all about was quite right; he was indeed condemned out of his own mouth, and signs were not wanting that he was only one of a disgracefully large number. In a work that consists of little more than rapidly sung dialogue this ignorance of the audience is a serious handicap. Even when the play is acted (which, outside the 'Old Vic.,' is very rarely the case) the text cannot be enjoyed to the full unless the spectator is familiar with it. When a musical setting is added, even a slight lack of clear diction on the part of a singer, or a specially attractive (and therefore distracting) bit of scoring or other feature of the music, will leave us completely fogged unless we know the play thoroughly.

Holst over-estimated the intelligence of the opera public because he could hardly do anything else. It has long been apparent that opera attracts the least intelligent section of the musical world, just as chamber music draws the other sort. I think it was Mr. Edwin Evans who, a few years ago, declared that the opera house was only a degree above the cinema in artistic value. It would not be difficult to make out a strong case for the assertion, sweeping though it may seem. Perhaps

I may be provoked to attempt the job some day. My concern now is to show how futile are most of the objections to this work of Holst's, based as they are on a purely conventional idea of opera. We are told, for example, that there is 'no action.' The same objection used to be brought against the plays of Shaw; but they proved to be 'obstinate successes,' and the objection is heard no longer. The large public that has enjoyed Shaw for a good many years would laugh at the old stock criticism. 'No action?' they would say. 'Does mental activity count for nothing?'

In his book on Delius, Mr. Philip Heseltine has some pertinent remarks on the question of what is and is not 'dramatic.' He says:

> When 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' was produced in London, in 1910, it was stigmatized by the reporters as 'undramatic.' But the word was hasty and ill-chosen. What was meant was that the work was lacking in the melodramatic elements which had characterised the favourite operas of the 19th century. . . . When it was revived in 1920, London's newspaper men collectively decided that Delius's opera was not an opera at all. This brilliant discovery is almost as enlightening as the old proposition to the effect that Homer's works were not written by Homer at all, but by some one else of the same name. . . . It would seem that it is asking too much of the average English critic to expect that he shall be able to discover what a composer has aimed at in his work before deciding whether he has achieved his aim or not.

And he quotes Mr. W. J. Turner on this point:

> How ridiculous it is to complain that this story ['A Village Romeo and Juliet'] is not dramatic! One might as well complain of Burgundy for not sparkling! The fact is, our operatic public has got so used to fat tenors brandishing cardboard swords, and to daggers, poison, and revolvers, and to abductions, seductions, and desertions, that they do not know what to make of such a strange, inert, flowerless passion as that of Sali and Vrenchen.

And apparently they don't know what to make of a work in which the abundant—perhaps over-abundant—activity is almost entirely verbal and musical.

If Holst thought that by calling his work a 'musical interlude' he would ensure its being judged by other than conventional operatic standards, he reckoned without the critics, amateur and professional. It is amusing to see them straining at such a gnat as Holst's choice and treatment of text, and yet able to swallow at a gulp the camel of operatic convention. Against every point in the 'musical interlude' to which exception is taken may be set a dozen grand opera absurdities that have been complacently enjoyed by generations of audiences. You may like 'At the Boar's Head' or not; taste is free. But you cannot fairly impeach it for not doing something the composer never meant it to do. If you find so witty a text and score dull, one can but express sympathy. And as to the cry about 'lack of action,' the 'Cav.' and 'Pag.' public will feel that way about the fifth Symphony until a Sir Henry Wood makes things right by taking a header into the big drum, or by emulating Toscanini and setting about a member of the orchestra. For my part, I got more enjoyment out of my hour at the Boar's Head than from many a three-hour 'grand' opera. And when it is performed and listened to, not as tabloid grand opera but as a mere episode, the value of which is literary and musical rather than dramatic, its entertaining qualities will have a fair chance. 'Literary and musical': how many popular operatic works can claim to be first-rate in either respect? This blend of Shakespeare and Holst shines in both, and, if it fails, the failure will be due mainly to the fact that the operatic public, like the theatrical, has little use for Shakespeare, and cannot keep its mental and aural faculties at full stretch for an hour on end. It wants to relax from time to time, with an Intermezzo, a juicy tenor aria, or some fireworks from the soprano.

I have to thank various readers for letters concerning rubato. I am particularly grateful to one who sends me Matthay's 'Musical Interpretation' (Joseph Williams, 7s. 6d.), wherein the subject is dealt with exhaustively in a chapter of about fifty pages, with numerous music-type illustrations. I am naturally pleased to see that all I said is borne out by such an authority—expressed, of course, in far more detail than could be managed in my note. A reading of this excellent chapter strengthens my conviction that rubato is one of the most abused factors in interpretation; it also provides me with powder and shot for future use.

On p. 536 will be found a long and interesting letter from Mr. R. H. Wilson, late chorus-master of the Hallé Chorus, replying to my remarks on choralism in the North and South (see April Musical Times, p. 322). Since his letter and my rejoinder were written, I have received a cutting from a Midland paper, containing a column report of a Wolverhampton choir's visit to London. The singers joined with the Alexandra Palace Choral Society in a performance of 'The Apostles.' Here are a few extracts showing the kind of spirit that led to my comments in the April Musical Times:

> It must be said that the personnel of the London choir was not equal to ours. It badly needed pruning. Tone and volume were poor.

Mr. Allen Gill has conducted so many performances at the Alexandra Palace that he may be assumed to know the acoustical peculiarities of the building better than any other living musician—except this Wolverhampton visitor, who had probably never seen the place before, and is therefore able to tell Mr. Gill (a mere Londoner) a thing or two:

> Mr. Allen Gill, the conductor, is by way of being a famous man, but one felt all through that he was forgetting the vastness of the hall—the soft passages were too soft and the loud ones too ordinary; the leads were too casual, and a loud passage was allowed to die away ineffectively.

But how came it that any leads were weak, with a leaven of Midlanders in the choir? After all, there were a hundred and twenty of them—quite sufficient to carry the four hundred and eighty slack Londoners to a triumphant success. But it seems that the inertia of the four hundred and eighty was too much, even for these Wolverhampton Wanderers :

> Wolverhampton choristers would have done better by themselves and with their own conductor. I know it was impossible to do this, but feel sure that when I hear them give the work next season my opinion will be confirmed.

Well, no doubt Mr. Gill and his singers (from whom I have on several occasions heard excellent performances) feel properly humble. Perhaps they were over-diffident on this occasion. The ordeal of singing with a Midland choir may have proved too much for metropolitan nerves. Anyway, this report will 'learn them' to know their place; never again will they venture to spoil what would no doubt have been a magnificent performance if given by the hundred and twenty off their own bat.

I was not present at the performance, so I am not able to say whether it was good or bad. I merely suggest that as the visitors seem to have had a highly enjoyable trip to London (judging from the report of their sightseeing and junketings), it seems ungracious to turn and rend the people without whose co-operation such a picnic would presumably have been impossible.

MUSIC AND ARCHITECTURE

By L. N. Higgins

There is always a strong tendency in people's minds to make comparisons and to seek analogies —I suppose with the double purpose of revealing some common underlying quality in two apparently different subjects, or of showing some fundamental difference in two apparently similar things. As to whether the result of comparison throws any light on the things compared, or whether the whole satisfaction lies in the discovery of some hitherto unsuspected resemblance, the answer probably works both ways.

The analogy between music and architecture is, I believe, a favourite one in æsthetics. On the other hand, it does not nowadays seem to be a popular idea, chiefly because it is ambiguous. If I say that music and architecture have a great deal in common, I may mean almost anything, or almost nothing: it all depends in what respect I am comparing them, and unless I can make that quite clear, I had far better not mention the two words side by side.

On the face of it, of course, they have nothing in common at all. A cathedral is built of stones, a symphony of tones; architecture is static, music dynamic; architecture is in space, music in the medium of time; architecture is primarily utilitarian, music is a natural expression of the human mind, serving no other purpose than the desire for that expression. The two arts are unlike in every respect one likes to mention. But the curious point about them is that their very dissimilarity is in all cases based on a common principle. We can begin to compare them at all only because they are both founded on the same rock—the rock of Form.

If one were to see an essay headed 'Music and Sheep Farming,' or 'Miners' Wages and Architecture,' he might be interested, but only because the two subjects under discussion were not even like enough to be called different. Comparison is only possible on some common basis, however fragile it may be.

I say a cathedral is built of stones, a symphony of sounds—but they are both built. I say that architecture is static and music dynamic, but that is only because they both possess Form. One is an extension in space, the other in time—for architecture overcomes space, converting it into Form; its arches and spires, though static, suggest movement and growth. And music overcomes time, converting it into Form; its melody and harmony, though dynamic (rhythm), suggest space and something which is static. In other words, though architecture is in space, it is not of space; and though music is in time, it is not of it. A cathedral is, say, a hundred and fifty yards long, a symphony lasts forty-five minutes; but has that really anything to do with their content? That hundred and fifty yards and the forty-five minutes are the merest superficial appearance; the contents of each are an eternity—something that is. Pull down the temple and tear up the score, and their ideal existence has not even been touched, for both the cathedral that is seen and the symphony that is heard are merely manifestations of Forms which are (I assume) masterpieces, Forms expressing spirit and life, created through the experience of men. Architecture, I said, is primarily utilitarian: I make that admission. But in whose minds is it utilitarian! Perhaps in anybody's but the man who builds it. If the builders of the great cathedrals had been thinking only of utility they would surely not have put up the edifices they did; they built for the sake of building, and the idea of utility was rather an excuse than a motive.

Moreover, I am quite prepared to be told that analogy between music and architecture is false on the ground that music is meant to express feeling, or emotion and experience, whereas all such expression if entirely outside the function of architecture, which is entirely a matter of geometrical form. This, of course, is true to a certain extent. I am not claiming that the two arts are identical. They would not be two arts if they were; it is only on the basis of their difference that a similarity can be claimed. Yet I think there is an answer to the above objection. Architecture is an expression of the human mind. The difference between Renaissance and Gothic architecture lies deeper than in a mere difference of shape; the two types convey a different idea, and spring from a different spirit, born of a different age. Two ages of architecture differ in style for exactly the same reason as do two ages of music, since they both give expression to the mentality of an age; they are both the expression of spirit in forms perceptible to the senses.

If I may be allowed to make the criticism, I might add that if some of our modern composers in their desire for expressiveness would see that this analogy is not entirely false, and that the art of music is, in a sense, an inheritance from architecture, the music of the present day might profit by their seeing it. If the desire for expressiveness looms so large that all idea of form is lost, or if the desire for perfection of form overcomes all idea of expression either in music, painting, or architecture, that art is fast approaching its death-bed. Only when art is a natural growth, when spirit manifests itself in visible or audible form because it must, only then can art be called truly great.

One has only to hear Bach's B minor Mass, or Elgar's 'The Kingdom,' sung in Hereford Cathedral, to realise that both the building and the music are only different manifestations of the same principle—the principle of man's supreme gift of creating Form. The fact that one is a hundred yards long and the other a hundred minutes does not prove to me that there is no analogy.

NEW LIGHT ON LATE TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. Grattan Flood

VIII.—Sebastian Westcote

Although we have evidence in abundance of Sebastian Westcote's powers as the writer of Court plays from 1551 to 1581, unfortunately most of these plays have disappeared, and, more unfortunate still, nearly all his incidental music as well. Of the twenty-nine plays that Westcote presented at Court only two can be definitely identified—namely, 'Wit and Will' (January, 1568), which Prof. Wallace is inclined to equate with the extant play, 'Marriage of Wit and Science' (licensed for printing in 1569-70), and 'Iphigenia,' acted under the title of 'Effigenia, a Tragedye,' on December 28, 1571. This latter play introduces four songs by Westcote, sung by the choir-boys of St. Paul's; and, by rare good fortune, the solo song of Iphigenia, with chorus accompaniment, music as well as words, is preserved in the British Museum among the Lansdowne MSS. 807.

Strange to say, Westcote was seldom called by his surname, but was almost invariably known as 'Master Sebastian,' yet his biography was never pieced together until the year 1911, when the present writer compiled from official sources a detailed account of his career, and published it in the Musical Antiquary (April, 1912). This silence of previous writers is the more remarkable by reason of the fact that Westcote was Minor Canon, Organist, and Master of the Choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, from 1551 to 1582. Though a professing Roman Catholic, who even suffered deprivation and imprisonment as a Recusant, he was permitted by Queen Elizabeth to retain his post till his death.

Westcote was born at Chulmleigh, Devonshire, about the year 1523, and became a choir-boy of St. Paul's, being a contemporary of Thomas Tusser, who went to Eton in 1538. Probably he studied under Redford, who was Vicar-Choral of St. Paul's in 1534. He soon got attached to the Court, as there is a record of payment to him as Yeoman of the Chamber, at Christmas, 1545 (Cal. Lett. Hen. VIII., No. 1,035). Six years later he was appointed to St. Paul's, and almost immediately he trained the children to perform plays. One thing is certain—on February 13, 155$\frac{1}{2}$, he was paid £4 19*s.* for presenting a play before the Princess Elizabeth, with his boys ('Household Expenses of the Princess Elizabeth during her residence at Hatfield, October 1, 1551, to September 30, 1552').

With the accession of Queen Mary, Westcote directed the music for the Coronation on September 30, 1553, and he prepared special music for the High Mass sung in St. Paul's on December 2, 1554, when Cardinal Pole was present, on which occasion it is probable that di Lasso's beautiful Motet, 'Te spectant Reginalde Pole,' was sung. At this date Orlando di Lasso, Philip de Monte, and Cabezon were in London. On New Year's Day, 1557, he presented a manuscript book of ditties to Queen Mary.

In a contemporary description of Queen Elizabeth's visit to Nonsuch, on August 7, 1559, when she was received by Lord Arundel, one of the features of the pageant was a play 'by the children of St. Paul's and their master Sebastian.' (Fleay considers that this play was the 'Nice Wanton.') Four days later, at a Visitation of St. Paul's, Westcote, among others, refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity, and on November 3 following he was deprived of his post. In 1560 he was made Head of the College of Minor Canons or Sub-Dean, and was left undisturbed at the Visitation of April, 1561, and, in fact, till July, 1565.

It would be tedious to record the payments made to Westcote between the years 1560 and 1575, but it may be well to notice that for the play 'The History of Error,' presented on January 1, 157$\frac{6}{7}$, he received £10 in addition to the customary £6 15*s.* 4*d.*

Notwithstanding Elizabeth's protection, Westcote was imprisoned 'for Papistry' on December 31, 1577, but at the expiration of nine weeks was released, no doubt owing to the interference of the Queen. He again presented his plays for Her Majesty's delectation in 1579-81, including 'Morall of the Marryage of Mynde and Measure,' 'Scipio Africanus,' and 'A Storie of Pompey.'

In the spring of the year 1582 Westcote became seriously ill, and he made his will on April 3. This will reveals the interesting circumstance that among Westcote's pupils were Thomas Morley, Thomas Mudd, John Bolt, and Peter Phillips—four distinguished musicians. He left his 'chest of violins and viols' to the use of the Almonry House 'to exercise and learn the children and choristers there.' He died a rich man, leaving Justinian Kyd (his executor) a bequest of £10, and appointing Henry Evans, lessee of the Blackfriars Theatre (afterwards acquired by John Lyly), as overseer, 'praying him to be careful for my sister Elizabeth Westcote,' a widow, his sister-in-law, to whom he left £20, as well as 'the lease of West Green which I now have, and all the household stuff and kine and cattell there.'

Westcote died on April 5, 1582, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, to the Petty Canons of which he bequeathed £5 to bring his body to the church. He also left £4 to the Vicars-Choral of St. Paul's, and £5 to the ten choristers, as well as 3*s.* 4*d.* to each bell-ringer and 10*s.* to each verger.

THE FUTURE OF PERFORMANCE

By G. M. Cotton

There is increasing curiosity as to the real nature of music and as to what that truly is which we call music. Passing by the more obvious scientific aspects (equal temperament, harmonics, beats, and so on), we find that there is a generally accepted distinction between music as thought and music as sound. It has been laid down by one who speaks with authority that music cannot be said to exist apart from the rendering of it. This implies that mental audition of, or 'auralising' (cf. visualise), a score cannot call into being the ipsissima verba, as it were, of the composer, and that therefore the reader is not enjoying music. It is argued that the score is merely a code of signals intended for the use of the second party requisite to the existence of music, namely, the performer or performers, and that, incidentally, it is an inefficient code at that. As it takes two to make a quarrel, just so does it take two to make a sonata, the composer and the performer. The essence of this view is that a physical translation of the signals is required before the message, that is to say, the thought, may announce itself to those for whom it is intended, and that only if music be thus incarnate can it be said to exist for them. The word must be made flesh.

Let us deal with this 'code' suggestion first. While there is no doubt that the growing subtlety of musical expression has emphasised some defects in present methods of notation, it is hard to see what system, other than one comprised of symbols, could be made available. It is possible, indeed, to represent music (as sound) graphically by means of curves. These are obtained by photographing a ray of light reflected from a mirror which oscillates under the influence of electrical currents as varied by the action of a microphone. But only one curve is produced, irrespective of the number of the sources of sound and the separate qualities of tone, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether the human mind will ever be competent to disentangle a single undulating line representing the sum of the sound vibrations recorded. (The indentation of a gramophone record is in effect a sample of such a curve, reproduced in intaglio.) With the player of a solo instrument it might, in some remote era when we have as a race transformed all our brawn into brain, take the place of the symbols at present in use, but when one thinks of the conductor of an orchestra, the members of which will have on their respective desks a graph of the self-same curve . . . ! And to begin with, who is to 'write' the curve? There is no doubt that what we hear at a concert is a complex of sound-threads woven into a single but inexplicable strand. But as hinted above, only the gramophone recorder can give this strand of sound a form in three dimensions, and only the gramophone needle can unravel it again to our perceptions.

But, to return to earth, the weak point of the existing code is not so much that it somewhat hampers the composer, as that it does not sufficiently hamper the performer! If the latter, acting as interpreter, be of one mind with the composer, and if he feel the music spontaneously and with a perfection of intuition, the complaint as to the insufficiency of the code from the point of view of the composer is largely superfluous, and no more need be said about it. Whatever the system, there is bound to be always an ultimate something in regard to which the composer must remain unsatisfied or inarticulate.

But in too many cases, as everybody knows, the ideal condition of adequate performance is not satisfied. The ambition to give a novel 'reading'; the attempt to 'improve upon' the composer as he is (ex hypothesi) painfully and laboriously expressed by his printed signs and symbols; the assumption, even, that he did not know what he was talking about—these and the ever-present risk of incompetence in technique, of poverty of mind, or of absence of heart, on the part of the performer, are the manifest defects of performance as an act. So long as we accept the doctrine of the inexorable necessity for the insonnation of musical thought before it may be communicated, these will be with us. It will probably never be known on this earth how much good work has been cast for ever into outer darkness simply because of the imperfections inherent in its physical performance. When to all these are added the discomforts of concert going, the inevitable lack of unanimity in the mental attitudes of the individuals with whom one must associate, and a certain irrelevant and adventitious excitement, especially in connection with a new work, it will appear that performance is but a poor thing after all.

The capacity for reproducing music mentally is one which all of those possess who 'think' their music. And it may be developed and enlarged by practice. A man who goes to a concert, as he says, 'to hear Popowski play,' is in a different class from him who goes to the same concert to hear the Brahms Violin Concerto. The one will go home thinking of a man who plays the fiddle; the other will find himself mysteriously back in his dwelling, having been crossing streets, paying fares, and (sometimes) escaping lamp-posts, while he thought of music. A man who plays quartets may find that he can 'hear' the quartet as a quartet better when he is neither playing nor listening. Even those who have attained to, it may be, something less than mediocrity in executive power, whether on the pianoforte or on anything else, yet retain the right to regard themselves as note-perfect in thought. They do not play wrong notes or 'out of tune' in their heads, whatever they may perpetrate with their fingers. Consequently, the pleasure and profit obtained from auralising their music is vastly greater than the pleasure and profit possible when they plant themselves before a keyboard or negotiate a fiddle. Besides, what is no small advantage, third parties remain untouched by the feeling of their infirmities. Such a method of enjoying that music with the physical sound of which we are already familiar, is naturally enhanced in value if we learn to get into closer touch with it by perusal of the full score. Our mental reproductive process based on memory is authoritatively guided and governed, unhampered by ineffective physical effort, whether our own or that of others, and undistracted by all extraneous and irrelevant affairs. Recollection, faulty at the best, is supplemented, possibly supplanted, by direct intercourse.

If all this be true of reproduction in the mind's ear, is it not conceivable that, with the maturing of the capacity for musical thought, production as exemplified by performance may ultimately be dispensed with? The present age has not the last word in any department of life, and it has it far less with regard to the art of music, which is still 'muling and puking' in the arms of the wet-nurse. The same remark applies to the power of mental audition. A large proportion of the population of these islands is able in the mind's ear to 'go over,' at any rate, a simple unharmonized melody, hymn-tune, or music-hall song. But there is no apparent reason why, with further development, the perusal of music scores, even in their present imperfection as codes, should not satisfy their descendants to a degree incomprehensible at present to the crowd. And since music increases in difficulty of execution concurrently with its increase in subtlety and expressiveness, the time comes when the ranks of those who can cope with it in performance begin to show gaps. It becomes less and less easy, then, to play those things which, on the view already quoted, it becomes more and more difficult to codify.

Furthermore, all composition is limited to the respective compasses of the instruments employed. While this restriction may not count for much in the case of the keyed instruments, whose compasses very nearly approach the bounds of human endurance, it is nevertheless of some moment from the standpoint of the orchestral writer, who has to carry in his head for continuous reference a sort of schedule showing the immovable limitations of horns, trombones, clarinets, &c. To the mind's ear, however, a passage written, but unplayable, may yet be audible, and only the extreme ends of the scale—those notes which are either too high to be imagined or too low to be notes at all—will be excluded, for the simple reason that the composer himself will not be able to auralise them.

Thus it would appear that the music score—unaided by physical interpretation with all its actual and implied defects and limitations—may yet, in the hands of Tom, Dick, and Harry, prove sufficient and more than sufficient. All that the future musicians will require, apart from a working knowledge of the code, possibly improved and amplified as a code, will be a well-established aural recollection of tone-colour. Musical education will consist of the teaching of the meanings of the symbols employed by the composer, and a firm grounding in the qualities of instrumental tone. Performance, with its costly paraphernalia (not excluding the critics), and its shortcomings on the physical plane, will be 'scrapped,' and composer and listener will commune the one with the other, directly and immediately instead of through the distorting medium of physical interpretation.

Finally, music will be capable of exercising its profound cultural influence free from the malign attentions of a philistine State and the commercialism of concert promoters who have at present to provide 'what the public wants.' We shall choose our own programmes every time, and we shall escape the entertainments tax. These alone are advantages worth dreaming about and striving after.

> Let winds and strings, conductors, critics die,
> For now we'll hear our music through the eye!

Concerts will be given in the grounds of Kneller Hall on every Wednesday till the end of September. Admission varies from sixpence to fifteenpence.

CHARLES BUTLER AND THE MUSIC OF BEES

By Gerald R. Hayes

The curious searcher in our musical past is sure, sooner or later, to come across references to the expression by musical notes of the sounds made by bees in the hive, which was attempted by a clergyman, the Rev. Charles Butler, early in the 17th century. The books in which it appears are, unfortunately, of extreme rarity, and the music is here reproduced, probably for the first time, directly from the original editions.

The author is, however, too interesting to pass over without a brief account of his other work. His name will be best known to musicians for his text-book 'The Principles of Musik,' published in 1636, a work which Hawkins describes with truth as 'both learned and valuable.' But this came near the end of a long life usefully employed in other directions. It is not given to many men to leave records of themselves which cannot be ignored by the historians of three different subjects; and the antiquarian in grammar, bee-keeping, and music, has each his special indebtedness to Butler.

The date of his birth is not known, but it must have been about 1565, as he took his M.A. degree at Magdalen College in 1587. Later he was given the poor living of Laurence Wotton, near Basingstoke, where he remained vicar for forty-eight years. He died on March 29, 1647. Amongst various works which need not detain us now, mention should be made of one on affinity as a bar to marriage, which received much attention in its day.

His famous work on bee-keeping, 'The Feminine Monarchy, or the History of Bees,' first appeared as a small duodecimo in 1609. It was reprinted, with considerable additions and alterations, in 1627 as a quarto, and again in 1634. The last edition is the same in matter as the second, but upon opening it the reader is at first puzzled by the strangeness of the words; it looks something like English but is almost unrecognisable. This is because the author had previously been working out a new system of orthography, the result of which he published in 1633, under the title 'The English Grammer; or the Institution of Letters, Syllables, and Words in the English Tongue.'

Although attracting a good deal of notice, the book failed in its object; but only just, for had the author been a little less logical and drastic, he might easily have produced lasting effects on our language. The work came out at a time when the chaotic spelling of the 16th century showed signs of sorting itself out, but too much was still left to the caprice of the writer or printer.

Butler, ignoring derivations, proposed to spell phonetically in the sense that each letter or combination of letters should have one sound-value only. Special letters, based on Saxon forms, were devised for such double consonants as 'ch,' 'th,' and the positions of the mute vowels (which were omitted) were marked by apostrophes. Butler not only published this work and the re-issue of 'The Feminin' Monarchi'' entirely in this spelling, but he used it again in his book on music which appeared two years later, so at all events he proved the possibilities of his theory. But the departure from established usage was too wide, and he received little or no practical support from outside.

The same logical thought and careful observation he brought to bear on his study of bees, but here it is softened and sweetened by a poetic feeling. Though intended in the first place as a manual for the bee-keeper, the work is lifted far above that level, and its insight and beauty render it worthy of a place beside the famous work of a modern poet.

It would be outside the purpose of this article to discuss its merits, but in most things it is extraordinarily accurate. Almost the only place where our author is definitely wrong is the very part which concerns the music. When a hive is sufficiently large to allow of several swarms, the workers save certain queen eggs from destruction by the first hatched queen, and other queens are hatched to lead subsequent swarms. At this time, curious, thin notes can be heard within the hive; according to Butler's account (and it was long before the true facts were discovered) this sound was made by the young queen beseeching the old queen to let her go. Actually, of course, it is now known that the old queen has gone long before, and the young queen is alone in the hive.

In the later editions the music is so elaborated that without a reference to the first edition our author might be thought to credit the bees with a power of composition worthy of an accomplished musician. It is not at once obvious that the song in four parts, reproduced below, is only his own fashion of describing the less elaborate notes from the hive.

In the edition of 1609 the following passage occurs :

> They [i.e., the old and the young queens] sing both in triple time ; the princesse thus :

> with more or fewer notes, as she pleaseth. And sometime she taketh a higher key, specially toward their coming forth, and beginning the old minim in A la-mi-re, shee tuneth the rest of hir notes in C sol-fa, thus :

> But the Queen in a deeper voice, thus :

> continuing the same, some four or five semi-briefes, and sounding the end of every note in C sol-fa-ut. So that when they sing together, sometimes they agree in a perfect third, sometime in a Diapente, &c. (if you respect the termination of the base), sometime in a Diapason.

How much more complete is the description in the enlarged edition will be seen from the following quotation ; the spelling has been modernised, as, without having special letters made, it is impossible to render Butler phonetic style in ordinary type :

> When the prime swarm is gone ; (if the stock shall cast any more) the eighth or ninth evening after (sometime the tenth or eleventh) the next Princess, when she perceiveth a competent number to be fledged and ready, beginneth to tune, in her treble voice, a mournful and begging note ; as if she did pray her Queen mother to let them go. Unto which voice if the Queen vouchsafe to reply, tuning her Bass to the young Princess's Treble . . . then doth she consent. And therefore (unless foul weather stay them until it be too late) you may assuredly look for a swarm . . . And as the Queen's voice is a grant, so her silence is a flat denial.
> This song being contained within the compass of an eighth (from C sol-fa-ut to C sol-fa) the Princess composeth her part within the four upper clefs G, A, B, and C) usually in triple mood : beginning with an odd Minim in G sol-re-ut and tuning the rest of her notes, whereof the first is a semibreve, in A la-mi-re. Sometime she taketh a higher key ; sounding the odd minim in A la-mi-re and the rest in B fa-b-mi. Sometime, especially toward their coming forth, she riseth yet higher, to C sol-fa, holding the time of three or four semibreves, more or less. Now and then she beginneth in duple time, some two or three semibreves ; but always endeth with minims in the triple mood.
> The Queen's part, contained within the four lower clefs, consisteth of minims, altogether in the triple mood ; commonly in F fa-ut, sometime in C sol-fa-ut, sometime in the other two clefs between them : continuing her tune the time of nine or ten semibreves, more or less.
> Sometime a third Princess imitating the Queen's voice in time, though differing haply in tune, joineth with them ; the more with their full noise, to incite the swarm to go, that her turn may come the sooner. And sometime a fourth also interposeth her minims to fill up the choir. But none dare counterfeit the voice of the chief Princess ; for that were treason on her person.

Before giving the words and music of the songs, Butler's further remarks on them may be quoted. He says :

> In this Melissomelos, or Bees' Madrigal, musicians may see the grounds of their art : first their moods (sometimes the triple or imperfect of the more, sometimes the duple or imperfect of the less), then the tunes of the six notes (ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la) where of the Queen soundeth the first four ; and the Princess the other two, together with the doubling of fa-sol in two higher clefs, to make up for the full Eighth ; and lastly the six Concords (an imperfect third, a perfect third, a Diatesseron, a Diapente, a sixth, and a Diapason), and if any man dislike the harshness of the seconds and sevenths, which now and then hit among them, he showeth himself no experienced artist, which knoweth not that as well in music as economy there must sometime be discords : yea and that in either they have their laudable use (as serving to make sweet concords the sweeter).
> So that if music were lost, it might be found with the Muses Birds.
> The several parts of whose song, comprising these mentioned notes, with pauses interposed (as I have at several times by a wind instrument, whose notes can neither rise nor fall, attentively observed), I thought good here to prick down; that you may see in them, all these particulars of their Natural Art. Only I cannot altogether warrant the conclusion; because in that confused noise, which the buzzing Bees in the busy time of their departure do make, my dull hearing could not perfectly apprehend it: so that I was fain to make up that, as I could. But I am sure, if I miss, I miss but a little.

Then follows the first song, printed after the fashion of the times, with the parts opposite each other so that four persons could sing from the same book. There are four verses, of which the first two are laudatory of the Feminine Monarchy, and the third describes how Antiope, the first Princess, being gone, Orithya, the second Princess, claims the same privilege.

And this she sings in measures mournful sweet.

The fourth verse leads directly into the bees' music:

To whose grave accents if her Princely Grace
Vouchsafe, with Trine Aspect, reply to make,
To sweetest Treble tuning sweeter Bass;
This mournful suit a joyful end doth take:
And then, when fit time they espy,
Some thousands strong
This Army royall gallantly
Doth march along.
Hark, hark, me thinks I hear in notes of choice,
This fairest Ladies sweetest mournful voice.

The Princess's 'mournful voice' is seen in the Mean of the second song; the series of grouped triple crotchets (or black minims) representing the bees' part. Her first call is given before the song, the other parts being silent. Then follow the first two verses of this song:

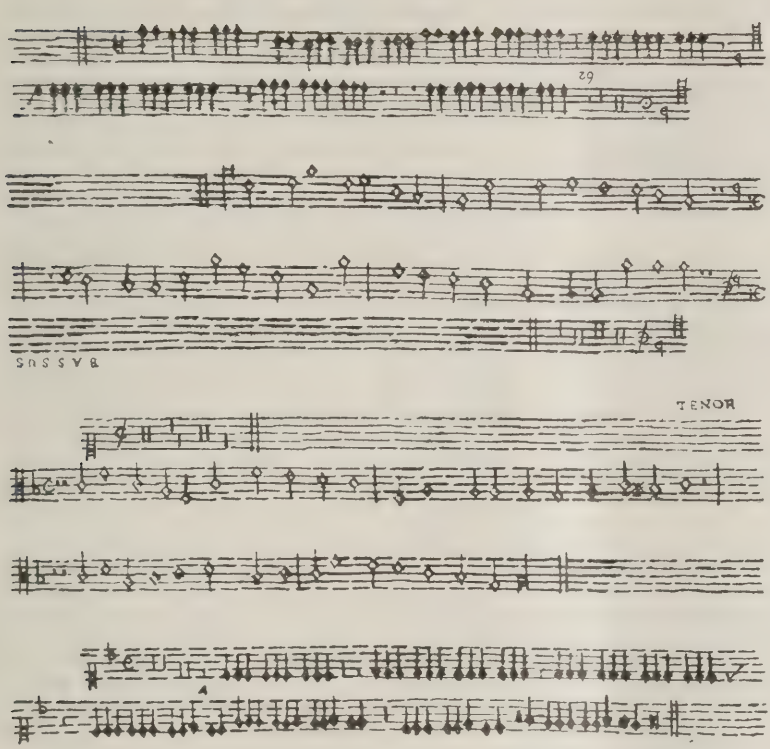
But all this while she doth chant it alone
Most humbly begging in her Doric strains,
Of her dear Liege leave to be gone
But comfort none she yet obtains.

Her Mother's silence makes her much to doubt
Her Grace unto her will this grace deny;
But still her suit shee doth hold out,
In hope at last to move pity.

The Princess's part is now given much more fully while the Tenor, Contratenor, and Bass represent the Queen and her two imitators. In these parts will be seen all the notes mentioned in the quotations given above. After this follow three more verses of the second song preceded by the following direction:

Sing this ditty to the second Tune; repeating the two last strains of the last stave: and then end with the first verse of the first song; repeating likewise the two last strains thereof.

Importunate Orithya now hath won
Her stern Queen Mother's grant to her desire:
For joy, her sisters all, as one,
With cheerful tones fill up the choir.



These Ladies Musical Consort assues
The Prince(ss) her much desired Sovereign tie:
The vulgar, when occasion serves,
(This watch word past) abroad do hie.
Where treading the Hey, right nimbly they prance,
Thus waiting their Prince, in and out they trace:
Who come, these Maids the Morice dance,
Along unto their resting-place.

In the accompanying reproduction of the music of the second song, two obvious misprints have been corrected on the photograph, one of key-signature and the other of time-signature; otherwise it represents the exact state of the printed book. The staves are built up of a number of small strips, giving a broken and patch-work appearance.

A few unfamiliar forms may be explained: the black semibreve (or tailless crotchet) has the value of a minim. The Longs explain themselves, and the rests for the Large and Long are respectively a double and a single vertical line crossing two spaces, while that for a Breve crosses one space only. The time-signature ☉ is the old 'Imperfect of the More,' in which the Semibreve contained three Minims.

Occasional Notes

Readers of the Musical Times are well aware of the work of the late Cecil Sharp, and will, we are sure, be heartily in sympathy with the movement now on foot for the provision of a worthy memorial. We hope they will read the leaflet included in this issue, and that, having read, they will give practical support to a scheme which will be not only a fitting tribute to Cecil Sharp, but also an institution of incalculable benefit in the recreational side of education. Only those who frequent competition festivals are aware of the great and growing popularity of folk-dancing in schools. Without Cecil Sharp the revival might never have been, and his great work can be crowned only by its perpetuation in the way proposed, viz., the founding of a central school of folk-dancing.

'Hiawatha' is again to be performed as an opera-ballet-masque-cantata at the Royal Albert Hall from June 8 to 20, for the joint benefit of the Royal Albert Hall Corporation, the Royal Choral Society (which provides the chorus), and the National Institute for the Blind. The cast of principals is to be changed from night to night. Mr. Horace Stevens, Mr. Harold Williams, and Mr. Frederick Taylor are the Hiawathas, and the Minnehahas include Miss Ruth Vincent. There is a rota of five tenors for 'Onaway, awake, beloved.' Mr. T. C. Fairbairn, who adapted 'Hiawatha' for the original production of last year, will again be in charge.

We welcome any attempt to develop communal singing, but we feel that the latest crusade by Mr.

Gibson Young, Sir Richard Terry, and others, made a false start with its slogan, 'Set England Singing,' and by its implication that nothing of the sort had been done before. Yet some excellent work in this direction was initiated by the League of Arts soon after the Armistice. We heard large crowds singing in Trafalgar Square, Regent's Park, and elsewhere, and similar demonstrations took place at a good many provincial centres. Again, has there not been plenty of stirring singing by audiences at certain competition festivals? We recall many examples. And the songs sung have been worth singing, which is more than can be claimed of some used in the 'Set England Singing' campaign.

The fact is, there is a lot of hasty talk on this subject. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, for example, has recently declared that 'there is not so much singing as there used to be.' We wish he and others would spend the month of May in a tour of competition festival centres. They would learn that, on the contrary, there is more singing than ever before in this country, both solo and choral. Moreover, the music sung is of a high quality that would have been undreamt of in the alleged 'good old days.'

On page 538 appears a letter pointing out the need for a psalter embodying freer methods of chanting than have hitherto obtained. We are glad to be able to announce that such a psalter is in course of preparation, and will shortly be published by Messrs. Novello. It will be under the joint editorship of Dr. Charles Macpherson, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, and Prof. Percy Buck—names that should be a guarantee on all grounds. In theory, all recent Anglican psalters have aimed at freedom, but in actual practice the methods of pointing have generally made it difficult for the singer to consider any other rhythm than that of the chant. The editors of the new psalter hope that their system will enable choirs to make a real step forward in the direction of the speech-rhythm that is the basis and chief beauty of good chanting. We shall give fuller particulars of the psalter as soon as possible.

Our correspondence columns have recently contained letters discussing cinema music. The writers showed that in some quarters the managers realise their responsibilities in the matter, with benefit to the taste of their patrons, and, in the long run, we believe, with good results in the box-office. Nevertheless, cinema music as a whole is far lower in standard than it ought to be, and we welcome any organized attempt to improve it. The British Screen Music Society is an organization with such an object in view. It hopes to achieve its aim by the provision of training by means of lectures, &c.; a music library for the use of members; the encouragement of composition and performance of suitable music; the holding of examinations, &c. The Society also intends to issue a monthly periodical, The Cinema Musician. A perusal of the prospectus of the B.S.M.S. shows its aims to be both high and practical, and we wish it all success. Full particulars as to membership, &c., may be had from the Controller, Westville, Babbacombe, Torquay. We add that the president is Mr. Josef Holbrooke, and the vice-president Mr. Cyril Scott.

There has been trouble at Sheffield over the size of the new City Hall. The question is whether it shall hold five thousand or three thousand people. Dr. Henry Coward, in a long letter to a local paper, urged many reasons against the larger hall besides the extra expense of building and upkeep. When he says that 'very big halls degenerate into cold, cheerless, forbidding, barn-like places,' because they are so seldom used that their owners cannot afford to keep them spick and span, we reply, 'at Sheffield perhaps, but not in London,' where our Royal Albert Hall is always warm and bright. But we sympathise with his argument that 'in a wilderness of space musical sounds dissipate to such an extent that all "thrill" and uplift are taken from even a powerful chorus,' and that people are not keen to go where musical effects are only mildly stirring. He adds:

> A hall to hold three thousand is the ideal for maximum of acoustic effect, combined with possibilities of a paying income, without any of the disadvantages of the five thousand hall. Therefore I suggest that the ideals of Massey Hall, Toronto; Usher Hall, Edinburgh; St. George's Hall, Bradford; the City Hall, Hull; St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow; and Queen's Hall, London, be adopted at Sheffield.

Yet sometimes we thank our stars for the Royal Albert Hall. How long would we have been working off the Galli-Curci madness at only one Queen's Hall a time?

The curative properties of music have long been recognised, but the value of musical appliances has perhaps been overlooked. We therefore note with interest that Mr. R. J. Pitcher, the inventor of 'The Techniquer,' has received the following letter from Mr. A. E. Kennard, the well-known bone-setter:

> DEAR SIR,—I have examined your apparatus for hand-development. Although I understand that it is originally meant for instrumentalists, I can see that it has a great future for the treatment of hand-stretching after muscular contraction, and is invaluable for the treatment of hand paralysis, rheumatoid arthritis, and other forms of hand trouble. Its simplicity, accompanied by its unique method of loosening the metacarpal bones and phalanges, must be of great value. I should like to know that the hospitals have adopted it. You are at liberty to use this letter if you so wish.—Yours truly, A. E. KENNARD.

We are glad to give this matter publicity because our monthly batch of inquiries for the 'Answers to Correspondents' column frequently includes questions on various kinds of hand disability with which a musical journal is not competent to deal.

The following appeared in the Daily Express:

BLAMING THE ORGANIST

> SIR,—In our present-day churches and chapels it is a common thing for the organists to play for a choir composed mainly of basses and sopranos. To my ear they play very badly when they start the basses in one key, and then play for the sopranos in another key. Perhaps the paucity of first-class tenor and contralto voices is due to this trick organists have of playing off the notes. CHARLES G. WOODHEAD.

Organists have to be canny folk at transposing, but very few are clever enough to perform the feats described by Mr. Woodhead.

RICHARD HOL (1825-1904)

By HERBERT ANTCLIFFE

It is almost a greater tragedy to be a person of moderate talent living among nonentities than to be such a person living in a land of genius and activity. Not only do birds of a feather flock together, but birds hatched in the same rookery are liable to be ignored unless they can get away from those born in the same circumstances. It is for this reason probably that Richard Hol, born at Amsterdam on July 23, 1825, never received the recognition outside his own country which he deserved. He was not in the highest sense a great musician; most certainly he was not a great composer, but living for nearly eighty years in a land that during most of that time was musically negligible, he suffered the neglect of his less-gifted fellow-countrymen, and was assumed, without knowledge, to be even smaller than was the case. Unlike his less-talented but lighter-handed fellow pupil, J. B. van Bree, one does not come across even his worst music among the choirs or choral societies of England and America. A reason, no doubt, lies in the fact that much of his work is written to Dutch words, and has not been translated.

Certainly if anyone ever deserved success for his activity, Richard Hol did so. To read his life, as described in the few dictionaries that have considered it worth while to include his name, is to receive the impression of tireless activity, of playing, conducting, teaching, and composing with an energy that was almost feverish. Had he followed his first inclination to live abroad, which various offers made to him during the 'sixties tempted him to do, he would probably have won a wider reputation, but he would have served his own country less well. Before he accepted the position of Town Music Director at Utrecht, in 1871, he had already composed a number of works that had a direct relation to Holland and to Dutch nationality, and his new appointment gave him opportunities for doing more of this, and drawing attention to the work of other Dutch composers, ancient and modern. There was at that time not the slightest sign of the existence of a Dutch national school of composers. Such signs are slight enough in all conscience to-day, but they exist. Then Holland was musically a province of Germany. Inevitably Hol followed the same course to a large extent, and not a few of his works are German in character as they are German in the words which form their foundation. But he wrote also works which began to reveal some connection with the feeling of the people of Holland, and which bore an intimate relation to their Dutch words and idiom. 'Ons Vaderland,' 'Janmaat,' 'Leiden's Glorie,' 'De Balling op Zee,' 'Leiden's Ontzet,' 'Vondel,' 'Vrede,' 'Hymne aan de Vrede,' 'Opwaarts,' all suggest that his mind was with his own country as much as it was with his art. Without these and other typical Dutch works the more thoroughly national output of Johan Wagenaar (his successor at Utrecht), Röntgen, van Anrooy, Diepenbrock, Zweers, Sigtenhorst Meyer, Pijper, and the young composers who are seriously striving to make Dutch music distinctive, would not have been possible. Except for a few short pieces, Hol's works are rapidly being forgotten. He was already passé when he died on May 14, 1904, but what he accomplished has had too good an influence to allow the centenary of his birth to pass unnoticed.

THE CECIL SHARP MEMORIAL

Mr. H. A. L. Fisher presided over a meeting held at the Mansion House, on May 18, in support of the Cecil Sharp Memorial Fund, by which it is proposed to raise twenty-five thousand pounds for the provision and equipment of a central building for the English Folk-Dance Society.

The following message was sent to the meeting by the Prime Minister:

> The proposal to establish a national centre in London for the study of folk-lore, and for the study and practice of folk-dance, has my entire sympathy, and I feel that it is meet and proper that such a centre should be a memorial to the late Cecil Sharp, whose services in preserving our national heritage of song and dance are deserving of the widest recognition. Our English songs and dances are, indeed, worth preserving. They reflect in their own way our national character, and the widespread interest in their revival, which unites all sections of the community, is one more proof that our class distinctions are really superficial in comparison with the underlying unity of feeling of our people.

The Earl of Balfour wrote:

> I entirely agree that music is the only art whose appeal can be made general, and I believe that folk-songs can be put to great use in this connection. I cannot, however, help hoping that broadcasting will enable really good orchestral music to be heard in every village in the country. I am convinced that there is an immense amount of good music which ordinary folk would love if they only had the chance of hearing it. So many of us hold the terrible superstition that the only way to collect and hold an audience is to play down to them. I am sure this is a great mistake.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald wrote that Cecil Sharp's work in rescuing from the forgotten some of the beautiful folk-songs of the country could never be held in too high esteem, and he would be only too glad to help in any way to keep his memory green.

Letters were also read from Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, Miss Sybil Thorndike, Mr. Gustav Holst, Miss Jean Sterling MacKinlay, and others.

Mr. Fisher summarised Cecil Sharp's life-work, and described him as 'artist, discoverer, teacher, and propagandist':

> We must thank providence [he said] that Sharp did his work just when it was done. Ten years later he might have been too late. He caught these primitive tunes and dances, going as far afield as the Appalachian Mountains to discover them before the advance of sophisticated culture had driven them into irretrievable oblivion. He was thus fortunate in his opportunity. Was it altogether an accident that in Germany, in Denmark, and in England, the rediscovery of folk-song had been coincident with a period of intense political trial and tension? In Germany the great period of rediscovery was after the Napoleonic Wars; in Denmark after the loss of Schleswig-Holstein; in England between the Boer War and the Peace of 1918. In the national memory of Germany and Denmark, the names of the men associated with the revival of the old tunes and songs of the people were kept alive. We ought not to let the memory of Cecil Sharp die out in this country.

Dr. Arthur Somervell and Miss Margaret Bondfield also spoke in support of the proposal. Sir Hugh Allen undertook to provide two hundred pounds from Oxford if others would do the same thing in their own counties. Lady Mary Trefusis stated that the English Folk-Dance Society had already raised about five thousand pounds, which was sufficient to provide for the site of the new central building.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Fugitive Notes on Certain Cantatas and the Motets of J. S. Bach.' By W. G. Whittaker.

[Oxford University Press, 12*s.* 6*d.*]

A misleadingly modest title, for this volume of nearly three hundred pages is packed with information, suggestion, enthusiasm, criticism, and scholarship that are due to methods the reverse of fugitive. Many readers will remember the material as having first appeared about ten years ago in the Organist and Choirmaster. Since that day there has been a marked growth of interest in the Cantatas. Small choral societies, and the more skilful among church choirs, are discovering that these works, formerly either unknown or regarded as impracticable, are among the best and most attractive of material for use at special musical services and other occasions, the staple fare for which was formerly a hackneyed Handel or Mendelssohn selection or a third-rate modern work.

But there are peculiar difficulties in the way of a conductor who adventures on these works of Bach—difficulties as to soloists, orchestral and other accompaniment, and (not least) some problems in regard to the text. Dr. Whittaker's notes are the fruit of actual experience in the performance of the works discussed. They are, above all, practical, and their value is not limited to the thirteen Cantatas and the six Motets of which they treat; from them may be deduced general principles that apply to other works. And, as is usual in such cases, the study throws a good deal of light on other departments of Bach's output.

Dr. Whittaker shows that the adaptation of Bach's accompaniments is far less of an obstacle than is generally supposed. The question as to the justification of such a step is settled by the obvious fact that in almost every case the score cannot be presented to-day as Bach wrote it. Some of the instruments are either obsolete or rarely used, and in others the quality and power have changed to such a degree that the effect is no longer that intended by Bach.

Dr. Whittaker is all for adaptation and compromise in this matter, and rightly. As he says:

> The filling in of wind parts on a pianoforte or organ, the allocation of an oboe obbligato to a violin, or of oboe di caccia parts to violas, is a small matter compared with the crime of leaving these masterpieces unheard.

Moreover, Bach himself provides ample warrant for such freedom, for when transferring a movement from one work to another, he sometimes changes the wind instruments, giving an oboe part to a flute, and even handing over brass parts to strings. No great composer ever had so frequently to cut his coat according to his cloth, and there can be no better proof of his greatness than the fact of the coat being so rarely the worse for the economy. What a contrast to some modern garments which are unwearable unless every thread is of exactly the right shade, and every button in its place! A year or two of writing regularly, like Bach, for a small choir and a motley and varying collection of instruments would be good schooling for many a young composer of to-day who has a full modern orchestra to play with while in his 'teens, and rarely condescends to think in any other terms than those of the whole bag of tricks.

The question of translation of libretti and song texts is now very much in the air, and the difficulty and importance of the task are fully realised. How lightly the translators of the not very remote past entered on their work is shown by numerous examples quoted by Dr. Whittaker. In fairness to the offenders, however, it must be remembered that only in recent times have musicians realised fully Bach's picturesque method of treating salient words. Hence such bad shots as fitting 'wake' to a progression that in the original is with striking effect associated with 'death.' This is only one of many cases quoted by Dr. Whittaker. No doubt a proportion of such blunders may be described to the translators' attempt to produce rhyme as well as reason. As Dr. Whittaker points out, the rhyming is a detail that need not be considered in cases where it is likely to interfere with a faithful fitting of word to note. Another difficulty that faces the translator of these cantata-texts has to do with the sentiment, which is sometimes of a personal and pietistic character that is out of touch with the more reticent taste of to-day. In such cases a good deal of skill and discretion are called for. In fact, the translator's job is so beset with problems, that even Dr. Whittaker (fertile as he is in suggestions and solutions) confesses himself as good as beaten in one or two cases. Fortunately, such Cantatas as are now being brought out in English editions have the advantage of scrupulous care in all respects. It is too much to hope that Dr. Whittaker or any other enthusiast will ever be able to give us a study of the whole of Bach's output in this field. This volume, however, deals with the various problems in such a satisfying way that (as is said above) we may evolve from it a set of principles covering practically all the issues likely to be raised in connection with Bach's choral works as a whole. Dr. Whittaker's 'Fugitive Notes' will take their place at once among the growing number of indispensable Bach books. The musical illustrations are numerous, and the style lively, readable, and entirely free from pedantry.

'Handbook of Music: A Course of Work for Elementary Schools.'

[The Manchester Education Committee, Deansgate, Manchester, 3*s.* 6*d.*]

'Practice in Staff Notation.' By Paul Edmonds.

[Sir Isaac Pitman, 1*s.*]

'Staff Sight-Singing Primer on the Movable Doh System.' By Gavin Godfrey.

[Joseph Williams, 3*s.* 6*d.*]

The young, inexperienced teacher of class-singing will find much admirable guidance in the little 'Handbook of Music' just issued by the Manchester Education Committee. It outlines a complete scheme of work evolved during recent years by Dr. Walter Carroll, the Committee's musical adviser. Although intended for teachers in the Manchester elementary schools, it will be found equally helpful to teachers in any class of school. It contains a complete syllabus of work, from the Infants' department to Standard VII., under the four main headings of Breathing and Voice, Aural Training, Rhythmic Movement, and Songs. The main part of the book, however, is concerned with the valuable series of Epitomes of Lectures to Teachers, delivered by Dr. Carroll. These are simply packed with sound advice and suggestion. Graded lists of songs—unison and two-part—suitable for schools are also included.

Those interested in the subject of sight-singing should note that the exercises from Paul Edmonds's 'The Elements of Staff Notation,' recently reviewed in this journal, are now issued separately, under the title 'Practice in Staff Notation.'

Classes of mixed voices (S.A.T.B.) will find in Gavin Godfrey's 'Staff Sight-Singing Primer,' suitably graded material for developing their sight-reading powers, in addition to a considerable amount of information on the theory of music. Many of the exercises are from well-known sources, but, as the author remarks, 'familiar songs help theory as much as theory helps the singing of the songs.' The book is in three parts. Part 1—which is also issued separately—includes exercises in major keys up to four flats and sharps. The minor key is treated in Part 2, and selections from well-known works form Part 3. Parts 2 and 3 are also issued as a separate volume. G. G.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS

By Arthur T. Froggatt

Some years' experience in searching for musical subjects in the Exhibition of the Royal Academy of Arts, compels me to admit that it very much resembles the search for a needle in a bottle of hay. Still, the former is a much more pleasant pursuit than the latter; and once more I place the results before the readers of the Musical Times.

The total number of works exhibited is considerably less than that of last year—fourteen hundred and nineteen instead of fifteen hundred and sixty-three—and I am sorry to say the proportion of musical subjects is lower, being one in eighty-eight as compared with one in sixty-five.

I failed to discover any suggestion of music in Galleries I. and II., and had nearly come to the end of Gallery III., when I was arrested by 'Practice Night' (168), Frederick W. Elwell. The scene is an upper room in a warehouse or some such building, with a band (all brass except three clarinets and a bass-drum) seated round three of the four walls, directed by an obviously enthusiastic conductor, standing upon a rough platform in the centre. The only feature to which I could take exception is the enormous size of the trombone tubes (more resembling water-pipes than anything else), upon one of which an equally enormous hand is resting, but which is apparently uncontrolled by any other human agency.

Gallery VII. contains a portrait of Mathilde Verne (322), by Flora Lion. The face and figure of the pianist, seated at her instrument, are well and carefully painted, but the keys and keyboard are clumsily and carelessly represented. 'The Rehearsal' (339), by Steven Spurrier, an operatic representation of the time of Louis XIV., is not attractive: the light on the stage is well managed, but everything is strongly outlined with that roughness of treatment which is at present so greatly the fashion. The orchestra, or as much of it as appears in the picture, is of course in shadow; a couple of 'cellos and a bassoon are about all that can be distinguished.

Gallery VIII. contains 'Orpheus and Eurydice' (366), by Fred Appleyard, a sombre picture, as befits the subject. Orpheus, holding a seven-stringed lyre, is looking back, and Eurydice has fallen lifeless on the ground. A vigorous piece of work, but lacking the beauty and charm of 'The Return of Eurydice,' by Charles Ricketts, in the exhibition of 1923. 'Joseph Ivimey, Esq.' (397), by Meredith Frampton, is the portrait of another musician who was also represented in the exhibition of two years ago—in this case by an etching and aquatint from the studio of George Belcher. 'The Chinese Guitar' (458), by Stefani M. Fisher, shows a girl seated and playing the yueh-ch'in or moon-guitar, a favourite instrument of the Chinese. 'Song from Afar' (483), by John B. Souter, is perhaps entitled to be included among the musical subjects of the Academy. It is a small but very delightful picture of a girl with uplifted finger, listening to distant music. 'Barbara Morley Horder' (502), by Madeline M. McDonald, can scarcely be considered a portrait, inasmuch as only the back of the lady's head is depicted. She is seated at an old-fashioned pianoforte or clavichord—I think the former, but am not sure, for it is carelessly painted, to an extent which is unusual even at the present day. The keyboard describes a line which is anything but straight, and a small portion of the wall behind has obtruded itself over one of the front legs of the instrument! 'Under the Dome, St. Paul's Cathedral' (567), by Frank E. Beresford, possesses a thrilling interest in this year of grace; it paints something which many of us may not live to behold again. It claims mention here because it does full justice to that glorious organ-case.

Among the water-colours, only one solitary work has any interest for the musician as such. 'The Fiddler' (683), by A. R. Middleton Todd, is a charming presentment of a village musician. I could name a Kentish village where an enthusiastic lady has gathered together a small band, of which this delightful old man might well be one. I hope there may be many such villages 'in England's green and pleasant land.' At least I am sure there might be, if only some one like my friend were at hand to encourage and conduct such an organization.

Among the miniatures we can discover another violinist. 'Margaret and her Fiddle' (904), by Elizabeth A. Steele, is as charming as the above, although in a very different way. And possibly this lady, if she happen to live in the country, may be just such a one as I have spoken of.

Among the etchings, 'Underpaying the Piper' (1022), by Edmund J. Sullivan, an amusing scene from 'Don Quixote,' is decidedly worth notice. The piper carries a tenor bombazet. 'Girl with Guitar' (1035), by Dorothy E. G. Woollard, in stipple, is a pleasant piece of work.

In the Architectural Room, 'Memorial Hall, London University' (1097), by Richardson & Gill, demands mention because of the organ-case, the main portion of which consists of a central flat, flanked on either side by two towers, and surmounted by a small compartment. In front of the central flat stands a small case corresponding to the old-fashioned choir organ; but if the details of the drawing are correct, the organist is to sit in front of this instead of behind it. There are several designs for stained glass in the Academy, but in only one of these have I been able to discover any indication of a musical instrument: it occurs in a 'Design for Stained Glass Window to be placed in St. Michael's Church, Stockwell' (1169), by John B. Trinick. It is, perhaps, needless to add that the instrument is a harp, and the musician is King David.

Sculptors are chary of attempting musical instruments—I have never yet seen a pianoforte in marble. All I can point to in the present exhibition is 'Pan—Garden Figure' (1409), by Hilda Ainscough; a juvenile Pan in bronze, playing a diminutive specimen of the double pipes.

SONGS

Mouldy caviare is probably more nauseating than the driest of bread, and the pungent discords that we learnt from Scriabin and the French, now that they are stale fare, are sickening. There is one chord, a ninth with a major third added above the ninth, whereunto some composers seem to think they may always resort in moments of climax: and nowadays, as soon as one feels it on the way, he is overcome with a sense of almost physical disgust. It seems to me altogether to spoil Francesco Ticciati's 'Fly, breath of the wandering wind' (Chester), when it occurs on p. 5. It is such a 'let-down'—the more painful because altogether out of keeping with the rest of the song, which has been of extreme simplicity, dependent almost entirely upon common chords. Eugène Bonner uses it, too, in his setting of James Joyce's 'From Dewy Dreams' (Chester), and from the moment of its appearance, on p. 3, we begin to lose interest in the song. Unsuitable harmonic effects also seem to me to spoil H. V. Jervis-Read's 'In Memory' and 'Grass' (Murdoch). Both of these start simply, and flow along smoothly until the hearer jolts up against chunks of far-fetched harmony. It is a relief to turn to a song like Gordon Slater's 'Tewkesbury Road' (Oxford University Press), which depends much more on its rhythmic energy, and its rougher, more homespun texture. And we see here that if a composer depends for his effects hardly at all upon harmony, harmony will give its services much more strikingly when called upon. The pause in the rhythm of this song, on p. 5, is a happy touch. The same composer's 'Lawn as white as driven snow,' though perhaps not so good as 'Tewkesbury Road,' shows similar virility.

Felix White's music always has quality, and the setting of Keats's 'I had a dove' (Schirmer), which must have been a difficult poem to handle, is a very happy example of his work. It is simple and charming, far from commonplace, yet not affected, and the accompaniment is beautifully written. From Boosey come the same composer's 'Sleep, happy child' and 'Freedom.' This last, with words by Tagore, is a much bigger attempt, and, though perhaps not so individual as 'I had a dove,' is certainly as good. Tagore also supplies poems for 'Three Songs,' by Franz Wiemans (Dutch words), published by Van Eck (S' Gravenhage). These songs, very modern and very difficult, pursue and illustrate the text closely, with great command of pianoforte effect. In fact, as in so many modern songs, the voice-part is apt to sound like an unwelcome 'rival show' interrupting a pianoforte solo. It is impossible to speak with any certainty about such elaborate stuff as this, which could be performed only by two virtuosi after months of study; but one can tell, after going through the songs a few times, that the composer knows what he is about, and has something to say. There are beautiful moments at the beginning of No. 1 and at the end of No. 2, and the last song has a fine climax. Whether the songs will be effective as a whole is another matter. And it is very questionable whether it is any good at all writing songs so difficult as these; anyway, the music must be very first-rate to justify it.

Wiemans sets English words in a Dutch translation; Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco sets Shakespeare in English, and only once or twice in these two sets (Books 5 and 6: Chester) does his speech bewray him. There are places, however, in 'A soldier drinks' and 'Arise' which an Englishman would have accentuated differently. Probably Book 6 is the better of these two, though 'Autolycus' in Book 5 has good things in it. I feel that some of these songs fall between the two stools of the lyric and the dramatic scena. The composer tries to throw the atmosphere of the whole of an Act or play into one short song, and though this may be a laudable desire, it tends to overweight the work. 'The Willow Song,' for instance, might have achieved more by attempting less. Questions of accentuation apart, it is felt that only an Englishman could set these songs really successfully, and it is highly questionable whether some of them could ever be adequately set at all, for the inconsequent, rather sinister movements of Autolycus's Spring Song, for instance, are the sort of thing that leave a composer very much lost.

From Winthrop Rogers come 'Three Old English Songs' arranged for voice and violin by Rebecca Clarke. These arrangements are cleverly done, and with a really good violinist should sound well. The second is specially charming. The last song in this batch, 'The Little Black Boy,' by Dom Thomas Symons, is one of the best. It seems to me a really beautiful song. It is simple, but a lot of skill has gone to the making of it; and it needs careful handling, as it might become monotonous if either singer or pianist were lacking in imagination. Blake's words have a strange and lovely quality which the music admirably interprets. It is a curious shock, after going through a number of mediocre or bad songs, to come suddenly upon this good one. One knows it at once for the real thing, because it brings him immediately into almost personal contact with the composer, as a quite definite individuality. When this happens, which is rarely, it means that one has found something which is not a mere attempt, but an achievement: it means that the artist has had vivid realisation, and has been able to convey some of it to other people. Singers ought not to overlook this song.

PIANOFORTE

The most important new work in this month's pianoforte music is the Concerto in F, by Alexandre Tcherepnin (not Nicholas Tcherepnin, but his son), which has been published by Chesters. It is a one-movement Concerto, requiring of the pianist a big, forceful technique and a great deal of musicianship. It is not a work of startling originality, but that is perhaps a good sign in times when so much music is spoilt by the desire to appear new; and in spite of obvious affinities to Prokofiev, and perhaps to Scriabin, it shows individuality and strength. Music like this needs to be heard, but so far as can be judged from the two-pianoforte arrangement, the Concerto is a brilliant affair. The pianoforte's chief tune is strongly diatonic, and good use is made of it, though the music seems to flag a little during the middle section. The prevailing mood is one of energy and virility; there is no con gran espressione, but lots of maestoso, impetuoso, leggiero, vivacissimo: and the energy is not confined to the directions, for the music has real rhythmic strength and impetus in itself as well as brightness and sparkle in the lay-out. The composer is now only twenty-six, and has other big works to his name, so obviously he is a man to be reckoned with. It is to be hoped that this work will soon have adequate performance in England. Surely, by the way, there should be an F sharp in the right-hand stave (p. 20, bar 22); but one can never be sure with this modern music.

Leff Pouishnov's Prelude (Enoch) is a trifle made up of pianistic nothings, but is well-written for the instrument. Like so many pieces of its kind, it drops to banality in the middle section, when it is trying to be soulful. Gastone Tuccoli has the foresight to avoid this. His 'Tre Impressioni' (Fabbri, Trieste) are frankly trivial, but sprightly; and as they pretend to nothing more, their triviality does not offend. They are not easy.

Three Suites come up for consideration, viz., Howard Carr's 'Carnival of the Elements' (Paxton), 'In Sunny Spain,' by Percy Elliot (Bosworth), and Boris Levenson's 'Arabian Nights' (Paxton). The first number of that by Howard Carr seems to me good, effective, genuine, light music; but the remaining numbers do not stay at this level—the third, particularly, is commonplace. 'In Sunny Spain' also contains four numbers: it is offered for pianoforte solo, small orchestra, or full orchestra, and has nothing to distinguish it from other music of its kind. Boris Levenson's Suite is more pretentious and difficult, but not striking. Spain and the East are terrible snares to some composers, who allow themselves to write the weakest of water, and think, by the use of a few conventional colour devices, to change it into wine.

'Dreamland' (Joseph Williams), a set of six pieces by Percival Driver, although very simple, short, and easy, has real charm, and shows sensitive musicianly workmanship. These pieces remind one of 'Kinderscenen,' not because they copy Schumann, but because they are really simple and sincere in the same way. They may be strongly recommended to all who are looking for easy music. Those who are out for difficulties should try Percival Garratt's 'London Fantasies' (Curwen), in which the composer makes use of almost every device known to modern pianism, including fist and forearm. These eight short pieces are descriptive of well-known London sights, and take us from Gog and Magog to Rotten Row, viâ the Monkey House and the Tower. They are difficult—one or two of them are very difficult—and pianists will have to judge for themselves whether the music is worth the trouble or not. The pieces are very short, and seem meant to be the merest sketches, but one feels that they are a little too heavily-laden to be successful. Their dimensions suggest that they ought to be simpler and more delicate, and their style suggests that they ought to be bigger. Probably 'Lavender Time' and 'Rotten Row,' which are the easiest to follow, and have the most readily recognisable tunes, will be the most popular. Time will show, when the idiom of this music has lost its newness and is not surprising to anybody, if the pieces have any real value. They will be lucky if they come up as fresh after a hundred years as do a couple of Haydn Sonatas (No. 1 in E flat and No. 7 in D) (Joseph Williams), among the five which Stewart Macpherson has added to his admirable analytical edition, and it is a good thing that they should be re-introduced in this form. They are small masterpieces, perfect in design but never stilted, and full of those charming surprises that Haydn always had in store. It is extraordinary that these Sonatas should be as fresh and lively now as the day they were written. But of course Haydn was a genius: he is a little neglected nowadays, yet he was in some ways more than the equal of Mozart, and that's as much as one can say of any man.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Six pieces for the pianoforte by Adam Carse, under the title 'Moods and Fancies' (Joseph Williams) may be recommended for pupils of about lower division standard. Their varied style is indicated by their titles—'Dance Movement,' 'A Story of the Sea,' 'Waltz-Study,' 'Pleading,' 'Fairy Tales,' 'Plaintive Thoughts.' They are published in two books (2*s.* each). More simple than these, and suited for elementary pupils, is a little suite of four pieces—'The Gipsies' March,' 'The Pedlar,' 'Rustic Song,' 'Evening Gossip'—entitled 'Through the Village,' by Maud Gilson (Joseph Williams, 2*s.*).

Also for elementary pupils is Leslie Woodgate's charming little dance suite 'A Fairy Ballet' (Murdoch, 2*s.* 6*d.*). These six little dance movements in different styles—Gavotte, Valse, Slow Dance, Minuet, Evening Scene, Jig—are particularly useful owing to the care bestowed in each one of them on the part for the left hand.

A set of fanciful pieces by John Longmire—'Butterfly,' 'A Wasp's Nest,' 'A Chinese Dragon-fly,' &c., under the title 'Nine Insect Pieces' (Forsyth, 2*s.* 6*d.*), should appeal to young people. They are excellent for rhythm and phrasing, and the left hand is well catered for. They would suit pupils approaching lower division standard.

From Winthrop Rogers come several short pieces by Alec Rowley suitable for elementary pupils. 'Pagoda' and 'Daffodil Glen' are separate issues from the popular little suite 'Kew Garden Scenes.' 'The Bee' is from 'Fantasy Studies for the Second Year.' Two pieces from the New Century Series, 'The Wood-Nymph' and 'Caprice,' are dainty trifles which require neat playing. 'Ten Bagatelles,' by G. W. Krogman (Hawkes & Son, 2*s.*), are tunefully—if somewhat conventionally—written. They all lie within the compass of five notes, and are very easy.

MUSIC FOR WIND INSTRUMENTS

Some time ago a wicked story was being whispered about a new orchestral composition of Schönberg's which the trumpeters of the orchestra played—owing to a mistake of the copyist—in the wrong key, the error passing unperceived by the players, the conductor, and the composer. Now the same story, adapted for the occasion, is told about the Sonate for two clarinets (B flat and A) of Francis Poulenc, just published by Messrs. J. & W. Chester. On this occasion the tale goes that the two players exchanged their parts in error. These, of course, are the inventions of sceptics and scoffers. At the same time it must be admitted that the evidence points to the fact that Poulenc is himself something of a sceptic. He does not believe in the past, and the Sonate for horn, trumpet, and trombone makes fun of the old sonatinas. He does not believe in the present, and whenever he gets hold of a little trick which appears to him good, he repeats it over and over again, as if to force a reluctant public to agree to his own estimate of its value. The system does not commend itself to me. Two heads may be better than one—when they are live heads. There may be safety in numbers—unless the numbers happen to be against you, and of one mind. The succession of notes which opens the Sonate for clarinet :

does not delight me more the tenth time I hear it than it did the first. To write nineteen bars for the second clarinet of is repeated nineteen times. Perhaps it holds some chaste virtue which escapes us who have been brought up in the belief that repetition originates in intellectual sluggishness, and generates only dullness and monotony.

(in an episode of twenty-two bars) seems to me only a sign of mental laziness. And these are not exceptions, but, obviously, part of a system. In the second movement of the same Sonata (thirty-six bars) the second clarinet plays nothing but semi-quavers of E's and F's for twenty-eight bars. In the last movement the bar :

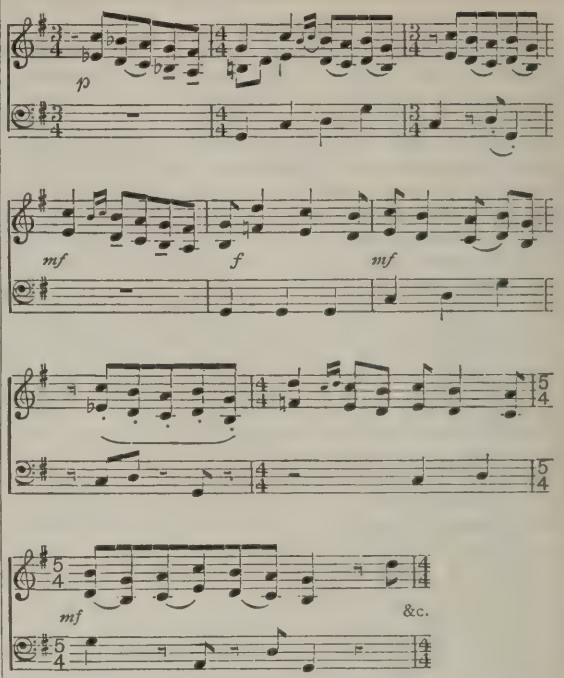
It will be said, maybe, that the worst effects of repetition are relieved by rhythmic and harmonics changes. The harmony and the rhythm may be simple or complex, but they leave the real issue untouched. Let us take, for instance, a full passage from the Sonata for horn, trumpet, and trombone :



Does it not seem as if Poulenc were over-rating the difference 'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee? If it is urged that he is only poking gentle fun at the ways of others, our answer is that the mere stressing of a fault is not the artist's way but the pedant's. A dramatist who wished to caricature the dullness of certain characters by making his scenes intolerably dull, would not be likely to get a hearing—even from the societies who specialise in Sunday performances. B. V.

STRING QUARTET

A Suite of Old National Dances in three groups has been arranged for string quartet by John B. McEwen, and the miniature score of these is published by Joseph Williams. The first group consists of an Old English and two Scottish dances; the second of three French melodies, and the third of Japanese dances. They are all well scored and interesting. I am most attracted by the Scottish 'Strathspey' and 'Reel,' dances which, to my thinking, are every bit as lively and exhilarating as anything that has come to us from the New World. Anyone who has heard a Strathspey competition at the Glasgow Festival must have realised how unjustly the possibilities of this music have been neglected. Perhaps these quartet arrangements may do something towards a better appreciation of the good things at our door.

STUDIES

The fundamental trill studies for violin, by D. C. Dounis (Strad Edition) should be of considerable help to students anxious to acquire in the shortest possible time a quick and rhythmical trill. The author justly points out that, in trill practice, elasticity and suppleness are far more necessary than force. In another edition perhaps he may add something to this by warning the student of the danger he runs in forcing tired fingers to continue to exercise when they cry out for a rest.

Ludwig Lebell's preparatory bowing and finger exercises for the violoncello (Joseph Williams) contain of course little or nothing that is fundamentally new. In the beginning there was a 'cello and a would-be 'cellist. When the two first met they exchanged the same passes that are now and ever will be the portion of the beginner. This particular work deserves some praise for its directions to the player, which are to the point and not redundant; they could, however, be expressed more simply and clearly. B. V.

VIOLIN

In his 'Intermezzo' and 'Bagatelle' (Strad Edition) Nicholas Gatty succeeds where hundreds have failed, for he has given us music which is not particularly difficult to play yet is both thoroughly 'musical' and interesting technically. The difference between these pieces and the immense majority of other compositions of the same class is that while others cannot hide the fact that they are fiddlers in search of relaxation, Gatty is first and foremost a composer who happens to write effectively for the violin only because he knows all about the genius and the technique of the instrument. His music must benefit and train the mind as well as the fingers of the student, and forms accordingly the only trusty and reliable stepping-stone on the way to the works of the classics. B. V.

CHURCH MUSIC

Of the latest issues of the 'Tudor Church Music' series from the Oxford University Press, some numbers by Orlando Gibbons are particularly welcome. Gibbons died three hundred years ago this June, and many will doubtless be making a special feature of his music during the coming months. The Te Deum and Benedictus and the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis—both from the 'Short' Service—are works that might be undertaken by choirs unable to cope with some of the more elaborate compositions. Some of the writing is harmonic in style; the frequent passages of flowing counterpoint are nowhere intricate, and are always grateful to sing. The music is for four voices (S.A.T.B.), and has been edited by Dr. Fellowes.

Under the same editorship appears Gibbons's anthem for six voices (S.S.A.A.T.B.), 'O Lord, in Thy wrath rebuke me not.' This is a fine example of expressive part-writing. A capable choir would be well rewarded for any trouble spent in preparing this beautiful little work.

Two other numbers from the same series are the 'Alleluia,' by Thomas Weelkes (c. 1575-1623), edited by S. Townsend Warner, and the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis of the third Service by Thomas Tomkins (1572?-1656), edited from 'Musica Deo Sacra,' 1668, by A. Ramsbotham. Weelkes's anthem is for treble, alto or second treble, tenor, and two basses. It is a splendidly virile work, and, sung by a good choir, should sound magnificent. Tomkins's work is elaborate, and there is much division of parts. While five-part writing predominates, six- and seven-part work occurs frequently. Obviously this fine setting — which runs to thirty-five pages—is not for the average choir.

Although too late for this year, organists might make a note of 'An Easter Carol,' by Charles Wood (Year-Book Press), words by J. M. Neale. It is a fine specimen of diatonic writing.

A new arrangement of Palestrina's 'Missa Brevis,' by William Y. Webbe (New York: H. W. Gray Co.), appears to be well done. The editor has abandoned Palestrina's breves and semibreves, and has adopted a modern unit of notation. The Agnus Dei has been effectively shortened by omitting the first section of the original.

The Oxford University Press announces the reissue of F. H. Shera's unison setting of the Nunc Dimittis in C, as a correction of the original issue. G. G.

STANFORD'S LAST OPERA: 'THE TRAVELLING COMPANION'

By F. Bonavia

It has been reserved for a group of enthusiastic Liverpool amateurs to give the first performance of Stanford's last opera, 'The Travelling Companion.' This took place at the David Lewis Theatre, which calls itself 'Liverpool's Old Vic.'—not inappropriately, for its resources at present compare with the resources of Miss Baylis at the 'Old Vic.' as Liverpool city compares with the city of London. If we read Stanford's temperament aright, it is not impossible that he himself made an early performance extremely difficult, for we know that the mere suggestion of having a fifth drum part played on the fourth drum was enough to arouse his anger. Well, the result has been a first performance which failed to satisfy the most easy-going, most tolerant amongst us. The singers and players of the David Lewis Theatre deserve every praise for their enterprise and, generally, for their good intentions. They are not professional people; they are amateurs who work because they like to work. They chose 'The Travelling Companion' simply because they felt that its production was overdue, that a good opera was neglected, and took upon themselves to sustain the rôle of champion. Now this is excellent; the spirit shown is just the spirit which 'gets things done.' The actual task, however, proved beyond their capacity—partly through lack of rehearsals. With a more careful and thorough preparation they would have succeeded far better; but other interests had apparently more serious claims on their time, and the opera suffered in consequence.

The odd thing is that 'The Travelling Companion' should have had to wait so long to be put on the stage. A few years ago, when fantastic opera was fashionable, it would have had every chance of success. It deals with a story derived from a tale of Hans Andersen, prepared for music by Sir Henry Newbolt. The chief characters are a destitute hero, John, and a legendary Princess whose hand and wealth are offered to the one who can solve a riddle. John, by giving his last penny to the robbers who would defile a dead man, befriends the dead man's spirit, which, as the Travelling Companion, advises and helps John in his adventure. The Princess, feeling that John is going to solve the riddle she set him, and succeed, goes to a Wizard for assistance, but the Wizard is slain by the Travelling Companion. The Princess's hand is won, and the Travelling Companion returns whence he came.

The music of the Prologue and Epilogue, describing a scene in the church, with thunder and lightning, the dead man's bier, and the robbers, is not very convincing, for, strangely enough, Stanford, although an Irishman, had no feeling for the fantastic, romantic elements that play so large a part in Celtic poetry. But the three Acts in which John sets about and wins the object of his quest are full of easy, melodious tunes, not quite so sparkling perhaps as those of Sullivan, but equally light and graceful. A theme which appears many times in the score:

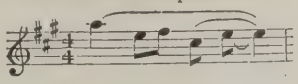
might easily have for its complement:



The maimed version of the orchestral score heard at Liverpool could not give us an indication of its merits. But, as the Symphony played under Sir Dan Godfrey a few weeks ago reminded us, Stanford was a master of his craft. Surely, with Carnegie Trusts and the revival of interest in Stanford, this little opera will have its chance some day? It has all the elements which appeal to the average audience, and gives full opportunity for stage effects of every kind. A representative performance is due if we are to avoid the charge of pusillanimity.

THE MISUSE OF THE TROMBONE

By J. A. Westrup

We live in an irreverent age. There is no respecting of persons in the world, nor of instruments in the orchestra. The aristocracy which was the strong pillar of our forefathers is now compelled to cut capers worthy only of the clarinet. The noble sackbut that once lifted up its jubilant voice in simple four-part harmony is now condemned to dance, a monarch become puppet, to any inconsequent strains that may be forced upon it. To be plain, modern composers have misused the trombone, and if present tendencies continue, it will become a plaything instead of an instrument, subject rather to the caprice than to the intelligence of the composer.

No one will deny that the trombone's chief assets are tone and dynamic range. Its crescendo can be the most powerful in the orchestra; its tone is equally the most noble and dignified of any brass instrument now in use. It would seem then an elementary point of orchestral technique to assign to this instrument passages in which it is permitted to produce this characteristic tone. Good players of course enjoy a technical facility which makes rapid passages quite possible and even effective. But there are limits. It is obvious that in the following example from the first movement of Franck's Symphony it is not possible to produce adequate tone both on the C flat and on the succeeding B flat:

Ex. 1. Allegro. Trombones I. & II. a 2.

The distance covered by the slide in this minute fraction of time is approximately 21-in. If composers would only take the trouble to make simple mathematical calculations of this kind before setting down such passages, much of the totally ineffective brass writing in modern works would be avoided. This scale-passage in Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance' is equally unsatisfactory for the tenor trombone:

Ex. 2. Trombone II. Allegro molto.

But the case becomes worse when we find the following in Holst's 'Jupiter':

Ex. 3 Allegro. Trombones I. & II. a 2.

Of course it is quite playable. The composer, a trombone-player himself, would hardly have written anything absolutely impossible. But I contend that passages of this kind, especially those necessitating rapid jumps from remote positions, are ineffective, simply because the instrument is not given a chance to do full justice to its tone. It is a peculiarly perverse characteristic of innovators that they try to bolster up their claims to originality by what is too often termed a 'daring' method of orchestration. But there is nothing new in these gambols of the trombone. Haydn, who was a progressive composer, assigns to his bass trombone the most vigorous antics. But we do not lift up our hands and say, 'How daring, how brilliant!' We make some commonplace remark of quite a different kind, picked up from books, or the lecture-room. This sort of thing is frequent in 'The Creation':

Ex. 4. Trombone III. Allegro moderato.

Beethoven frequently uses the trombones in the same way to support the voice in florid fugue subjects. But everyone who has heard the Mass in D knows the unsatisfactory 'fire-spitting' effect of this contrapuntal writing.

About a year ago a letter appeared in the Musical Times complaining of the extreme height of trumpet parts. The same applies to the trombone. There is no reason why the extreme harmonics of the tenor trombone should not occasionally be employed, though the expediency of writing them pianissimo as Strauss does in 'Tod und Verklärung' is at least doubtful.* But whole melodies in this register, especially when an innumerable number of other instruments are doubling, are unnecessary, and tiring to the player. Here is a passage from 'Uranus':

Ex. 6. Trombones I. & II. Allegro. a 2.

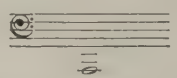
Little is gained by ignoring the workable compass of an instrument. Forsyth† says of Wagner's

Ex. 7.



for the bassoon, 'This is, perhaps, one of the things

* See also Schönberg, 'Fünf Orchesterstücke' (Op. 16).

† 'Orchestration,' p. 233.

in which it is better not to imitate Wagner.' He might have pointed the moral that the inadvisable notes of an instrument are as much to be avoided as those which are impossible.

If composers are going to write the extreme notes as though they were normal, why not continue the harmonic series up to the 12th on the tenor trombone, and treat it like an exalted horn? All the four notes (C, D, E flat, F) are 'possible.' But what is the use of the trumpet if the trombone is normally going to command this extensive compass? The trombone cannot have it both ways. At present, like Peer Gynt, it is 'nor one thing nor the other, only so-so.' Orchestration is becoming ridiculous when the same performer has to play

Ex. 9.

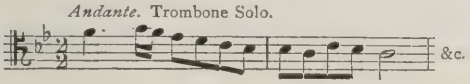
one minute and the next. Such invasion of the fields of tuba and trumpet is superfluous.

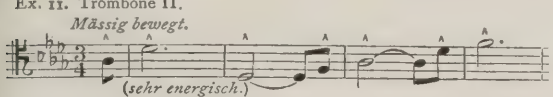
Nor is the trombone essentially a solo instrument. The beginning of the 'Tuba mirum'* in Mozart's 'Requiem' sounds all right, but when it comes to:

Ex. 10.



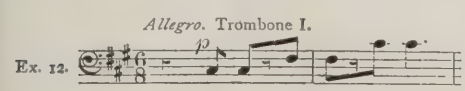
the lesson is almost too forcibly driven home. The opening sounds satisfactory, because all the notes except one are what would be 'open' notes of the harmonic series if the trombone were a 'natural' instrument. The truth remains that however chromatic our modern brass instruments may be, the best effect is obtained by using them as though they were producing mainly these open notes. This does not mean that other notes are to be excluded or that scale-passages are bad, but simply that 'fanfare' passages are the most effective. Mendelssohn's arrangement of 'Wachet auf' in 'St. Paul' is a good example. Wagner's scores abound with instances. The following,† selected quite at random, will serve:

Ex. 11. Trombone II.



It is true that this is not a harmonic series as such on the tenor trombone, but it sounds as if it is, which is all that really matters. Such passages are just as effective piano—e.g.,

Ex. 12.



from 'Peer Gynt.'

The other way in which the trombone can perform its proper ἔργον is by sustaining long notes. This sounds an obvious truism, but an examination of contemporary scores will show to what extent it is neglected. The classical composers were not entirely foolish when they used the trombone in this way. What could be more electrifying than the entry of the trombones in bar 185 of the Gloria of Beethoven's Mass in D, or the chord of D major at the very end of Brahms's second Symphony? But composers have become so fascinated by the acrobatic possibilities of what is in reality a very dignified instrument that they must keep it ever on the move. 'Moderns, beware!' said Pope, a motto which might well be inscribed on the portals of our musical institutions. In the concert-halls it would merely appear fatuous, so long as composers treat instruments in so cavalier a fashion. It may, indeed, be the fault of players for cultivating the staccato and sforzando at the expense of the sostenuto. But it is clearly the composer who is responsible for writing florid and ineffective passages.

There are three main points to be summarised: (1, elementary, but often disregarded), passages in which the slide has to travel such a distance as to render proper tone-production impossible should not be written; (2), the first effective way of writing for the trombone is the 'fanfare'; (3), the second is the sostenuto. I have omitted the short staccato snaps beloved of our players, because the effect of these is percussive rather than tonal, and so they hardly come inside the sphere of what is peculiarly suited to the trombone. In conclusion, it may be remarked that points (2) and (3) apply with nearly equal force to other brass instruments.

* The Germans cling pathetically to the belief that the last trump is a trombone. Cf. Brahms's 'Requiem,' p. 201 (miniature score).

Gramophone Notes

By 'Discus'

COLUMBIA

The outstanding orchestral record of the month is that of the 'Enigma' Variations, conducted by Sir Henry Wood, in eight parts. Although there are a few weak spots—e.g., in the Finale—the result as a whole is excellent. I have heard more fairy-like performances of 'Dorabella,' but Sir Henry is 'all out' to good purpose in the brilliant and vigorous Variations. Some of the wood-wind reproduction is among the best I have known.

For the benefit of readers who may wish to obtain certain Variations alone, here is their disposition on the four records: (1) Theme and Variations 1-7; (2) Variations 8-10; (3) 11-13; (4) Variation 14 and Finale. What a masterpiece this is! Are there six better modern orchestral works?

We are in luck with Haydn these days. Here is the 'Emperor' Quartet, played by the London String Quartet — a fine bit of playing and recording (three d.-s.).

One violin and one pianoforte record are to hand—both first-rate. Leo Strockov plays the Rimsky-Korsakov 'Chanson Hindoue' and Sarasate's transcription of Moszkowski's 'Guitarre'; and Pouishnov the Debussy Arabesque in G and a Glazounov Polka (both 10-in. d.-s.). The pianoforte tone is notably good.

I am all for the use of string quartet accompaniment to vocal solos, but they should be better written than those used with Dora Labbette's singing of 'The Flowers of the Forest' and 'Ye Banks and Braes.' The harmonization of the latter is particularly feeble, with a mawkish touch in the cadence that is quite out of place. By the by, the Columbia Bulletin gives 'Ye Banks and Braes' as being by 'Burns and Stein,' and the other song as 'Elliot, arr. Macfarren.' This is both confusing and inaccurate; and, whoever the composer of 'Ye banks and Braes' may have been, I'm sure his name was not Stein. Miss Labbette's singing of these beautiful airs has the right simplicity and expressiveness.

H.M.V.

One would expect a French orchestra's performance of Berlioz's 'Fantastic' Symphony to be peculiarly good, but I must confess to some disappointment with the playing (or the recording) of the work by the Pasdeloup Orchestra, conducted by Rhéné-Baton (six d.-s.). The Symphony itself is not of red-hot interest apart from the 'March to the Scaffold' and the 'Witches' Sabbath,' and in this performance a good deal of the earlier portion of the work is even duller than usual. The recording of the 'Witches' Sabbath' is unusually good. The 'March to the Scaffold' comes out well except in its final moment, where the pizzicato bass and the drum-rolls that follow the descent of the knife are too weak to give us the right shuddersome effect. We don't hear the head fall; it might be a mere pimple.

The string records for the month are of Thibaud, playing movements from Veracini's Sonata in E minor, arranged by J. Salmon (12-in. d.-s.), and Suggia, n the Prelude and Allemande of Bach's Suite in C (12-in. d.-s.). Both are excellent. I must confess, however, that Bachian as I am, I have little use for the old man's unaccompanied string music, save for a movement here and there. One must be a string player to appreciate it fully, and no doubt 'cellists will revel in this (to me) boring Suite.

I doubt if any Paderewski record has beaten his latest—Schubert's B flat Impromptu (12-in. d.-s.). His delicacy and grace are inimitable, and the pianoforte tone far better than we usually get from him.

Eric Marshall sings very sympathetically in Schumann's 'Die Lotosblume' and 'Du bist wie eine Blume' (10-in. d.-s.); Ezio Pinza is heard by all but the stone deaf in an air from 'La Favorita'; L'Alessio joins him in a duet from 'Norma' (10-in. d.-s.); and Toti dal Monte sings Jules Benedict's Variations on 'Carnevale di Venezia' (12-in. d.-s.). If the oft-suggested list of the world's worst music is ever compiled, these Variations of Benedict's should secure a place among the pick. For downright fatuity I know few things to equal them. If you can hear the whole of this record without a guffaw, you have either a lot of self-control or little sense of the ridiculous. The singing is well enough for those who worship top notes and 'stunts.' I don't.

VOCALION

It was a happy notion to record the 'Siegfried Idyll' in a performance by the instrumental force for which Wagner wrote it. We have grown so accustomed to hearing it played by a full orchestra that we need to be reminded of its essentially chamber-music quality. I have only once heard it in London in its original form; the occasion was the presentation of the Philharmonic Society's gold medal to Sir Henry Wood, who during the proceedings conducted a performance by a picked little body of players. This Vocalion record is on four sides; the conductor is Mr. Stanley Chapple, who is rapidly making a position for himself in this kind of work. The playing and recording are worthy of this exquisite piece, though it is to be hoped that gramophonists will, before hearing it, do their best to forget the full orchestral sonorities with which they have hitherto associated it. Otherwise they may be disappointed.

Well up to the standard we expect from such players are the records of Jelly d'Aranyi in a Purcell air and Leclair's Sarabande and Tambourin (12-in. d.-s.); and of York Bowen in his own 'A Romp' and Rachmaninov's 'Polichinelle.' The pianoforte tone in the latter is first-rate (10-in. d.-s.).

There are some good vocal records. Roy Henderson is heard to great advantage in Schubert's 'Erl-King,' his variation of tone-colour being capital. (But I wish he wouldn't parlando the end.) In the same composer's 'Serenade' he is less well suited (12-in. d.-s.).

Malcolm McEachern is fine in the florid parts of 'Revenge! Timotheus cries,' but in the middle section there is a lack of contrast in tone, and his words are not clear—an unusual failing in this singer (10-in. d.-s.). The clearness of his florid singing is notable; in the past it has struck some of us as being a weak spot in his equipment.

John Coates is heard in a curiously unequal record. His singing of Holbrooke's 'Come not when I am dead' is splendid in every way; but on the other side he distorts Stevens's 'Sigh no more,' and makes this cheerful ditty into quite a melancholy affair. His final 'hey nonni nonni' is almost tearful. There may be subtle Coatesian humour in this, and perhaps it 'comes off' in the concert-room, but per gramophone it is all wrong. Isn't Mr. Coates developing a habit of overpointing his old English songs? I have thought so for some time, and his gramophone records seem to be proving it.

THE FESTIVAL OF MR. ARNOLD DOLMETSCH

By Gerald R. Hayes

One of the most important musical events of the year will be the Haslemere Festival of Chamber Music to be held from August 24 to September 5. It is far more than its title implies, for it will provide, almost for the first time, an opportunity for the life-work of its organizer to be appreciated in all its phases. It would be more aptly entitled the Festival of Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch. Every one, of course, knows something of Mr. Dolmetsch's work in the revival of the music of the past, but at present only a few have any idea of the variety and depth of his genius as scholar, executant, and craftsman.

The music will naturally be chosen from those periods in whose interpretation Mr. Dolmetsch is the acknowledged master. Not only will the magnificent instrumental compositions of the 16th and 17th centuries be faithfully interpreted on the viols, lute, recorder, &c., for which they were written, but a section of the Festival will be devoted to the 18th-century composers, including Haydn and Mozart, whose works will be given with all the accuracy that Mr. Dolmetsch's researches make possible. In particular, a considerable share of the time will be allotted to the works of J. S. Bach, with some of his Concertos for rare combinations of instruments, Sonatas for harpsichord and violin, harpsichord and viola da gamba, and, for the clavichord, his Preludes and Fugues, the Chromatic Fantasia, and other pieces.

The fruition of Mr. Dolmetsch's long labours in the construction and technique of the violin as necessary for the true performance of Bach's unaccompanied violin music, will be heard in his playing of these noble pieces. Owing to the immense technical difficulties, frequently involving the holding of three sustained parts, far too little is known of this side of Bach's work, and it is no small achievement that, after years of experiment, Mr. Dolmetsch should have restored the violin and its bow to the playing conditions in which it left the hands of the unapproached masters of the great period.

One of the most interesting features of the Festival will be the exhibition, every morning, of Mr. Dolmetsch's unique collection of old instruments, upon which demonstrations will be given. Visitors will be able also to see something of his own work as a master craftsman in the recorders, virginals, and clavichords of his making, the results of years of the most patient experiment and research. He has given a life-time to the discovery of the ideals and technique of a lost art whose true value can only be appreciated in an atmosphere of its own. To those unfamiliar with this music the Festival will give the opportunity necessary for the ear and mind to get accustomed to its idiom.

Apart from these specialised interests, the Festival will have a deeper significance for the future of music, as its whole purport will be to show what wonders have been accomplished in the past by the composers of chamber music. The work of Mr. Dolmetsch is a standing encouragement for music as a personal matter closely interwoven with daily life, and not only for the virtuoso and the concert-hall. In the English music of the Golden Period, when it was a truly national art, the future composer may find the finest inspiration in outlook, construction, and tonal effects.

Player-Piano Notes*

BY WILLIAM DELASAIRE

CLASSICAL

I suppose the most important 'Duo-Art' roll this month is Schumann's Toccata (A.C. 6498). Despite its early date (Op. 7) this is, in my opinion, one of the finest of all his works. Harold Bauer plays it with splendid vigour, and at a speed which laughs at its technical difficulties yet makes no sacrifice of clarity. The player inserts a seventh in the last of the introductory chords, however, and in the repetitions of this passage this is most disagreeable to my ear. It is foreign to any edition or performance in my experience, and strikes me as being just beyond the border-line of legitimacy. Still, as a whole, the roll is one which I cordially recommend. I am at a loss to understand the label on the first movement of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony (A.C. 0660). It says: 'Arranged and played by Albert Stoessel.' Arranged—yes; but played? From his photograph the gentleman appears to be an ordinary mortal, yet to play this arrangement the pianist would need at least two pairs of hands. In numerous passages the spacing and number of notes are such that human fingers could not possibly play them simultaneously. From the pianistic point of view, therefore, the roll is not good. Comment on the music is superfluous at this time of day, and as an initiation into its text the roll is no doubt useful, but there its value ends. Quite the reverse may be said of Dohnányi's Capriccio, Op. 3, No. 4 (A.C. 6703), played by Raymond Wilson. The music is essentially pianistic, as would be expected from such a composer, and is almost Lisztian in its richness. The first subject is somewhat sinister, perhaps, for the title, but the second is pleasantly lyrical.

Liszt's arrangement of Schumann's song, 'Dedication' (A.C. A779), gives us the hand-played roll in all its beauty. I cannot imagine a finer performance than this by Arthur Shattuck. Rubato is always dominated by rhythm, liberty never becomes licence, sentiment never sentimentality; and the tune seems to have curbed even Liszt's paraphrasing excesses. I should be glad to meet the player-pianist who, using a straight-cut roll, could produce anything approaching the beautiful effect of this roll. Mendelssohn's 'Lost Illusion' ('Lieder ohne Worte,' Op. 67, No. 2) is played in nice style by Ellen Ballon (A.C. A783), and will doubtless please many. The Brahms Intermezzo, Op. 116, No. 5 (A.C. T24548), is a little obscure at first hearing, but repetition reveals a restrained and intimate emotional content that is very Brahmsian. Such a roll taxes the skill and interpretative faculties of the player-pianist to the utmost. The same composer's Ballade, Op. 10, No. 1 (A.S. 93432), I commented upon last month.

POPULAR

The 'Duo-Art' rolls provide us with two 'musical box' pieces; the first is so called—'Boite à Musique,' composed and played by Emil Sauer (A.C. 0224)—and the second is Glazounov's 'Miniature,' Op. 42, No. 2, played by Lamond (A.C. 0225). Both are exceedingly pretty—this is the word which almost every one will apply to them—and have a certain ephemeral charm which will delight all save perhaps the super-modernists of last month's 'Amateurs' Exchange.' Those looking for a concert waltz in excelsis should try Moszkowski's Waltz, Op. 34, No. 1, in E (A.C. A777). It is brilliantly played by Ethel Leginska, and is a perfect example of the composer's tuneful and sparkling style. Valse Caprice, Op. 6, No. 1, by Nevin (A.C. 785), is superficial, but will probably please up to the third time of asking. The foreign title of 'Chanson Joyeuse,' by Marion Davis (A.C. T24594), is, I am afraid, a cloak to cover poverty of invention; the disguise is ineffective, as with so many pieces of this kind. Pouishnov's Petite Valse (A.S. 93434) is equally undistinguished, but is a well-written fragment, and would make a pleasant encore item. A sort of seasonable anthology is provided in 'Famous Butterflies in Music' (A.S. 90658), in which Grieg and Chopin easily outshine their companions, but leave Rosenthal's 'Papillons' fluttering very beautifully. Field plainly shows us, in his Nocturne No. 5, in B flat minor (A.S. 93439), where Chopin learnt his lessons in this style. Indeed, one might readily be forgiven for mistaking it for an early work of the master himself. This, I think, is sufficient recommendation. A selection from 'La Boutique Fantasque' (A.S. 93430/1), being an arrangement by Respighi of Rossini's music, provides two very interesting rolls. From the pianistic point of view they suffer from the old trouble of having too many notes, but many of the extracts are clever little tone-pictures that supply good practice in a variety of styles.

MODERN BRITISH MUSIC

The S. & P. Company provides us with an excellent batch of works by living British composers. These are of varying merit, of course, but the enterprise is highly commendable. Bax's 'Lullaby' (6017) is now too well-known to need praise from me. Its modernism is delightful, and Trevor Hansen plays with the utmost refinement. A most effective piece for the player-piano is Percy E. Fletcher's 'Palanquin Dance,' from the 'Idylesques' (6053). The left-hand solo in the middle section gives excellent opportunity for careful phrasing. Two unpretentious little salon pieces are Haydn Wood's 'An Autumn Song' (6014), which wends its happy way in the style of his ballads, and 'Romantic Prelude,' by H. Baynton-Power (6046). In each case the pianist makes the most of slight material. Harold Clark plays his own Rhapsody (6043), and two Preludes (6044), the former being a vigorous outburst, not specially modern in style, played with a fine éclat; the Preludes are in C minor and D flat, the first much in the style of the old masters, the second in a more romantic vein. Both are interesting little pieces, admirably played. Cyril Scott gives us his characteristic new wine in old bottles in his British melodies—'All through the night,' 'The Wild Hills of Clare,' and 'Summer is acumen (sic) in,' which are all included in roll No. 6012. Of course, it is the sort of treatment that one either definitely likes or dislikes, and in my present mood I think I am in the former category. And lastly, 'The Dew Fairy,' by Frank Bridge (6016), is a delightfully played piece of impressionism which lends itself gratefully to the instrument.

These rolls are all hand-played, and for the most part would form a valuable addition to a library having any pretensions to being comprehensive. One hopes that some bigger works may be forthcoming in the near future. Such an enterprise, considering the moderate price of the rolls, deserves every support.

SONGS

A word of praise is again due to the Æolian Company for giving us Roger Quilter's beautiful song 'To Daisies.' It is a real gem among song rolls. The accompaniment is, of course, hand-played, so that with any sort of attention on the accompanist's part, an almost perfect pianoforte part may be provided—even to the most 'soulful' singer! Very pleasing, but less important, is Grimshaw's 'Songs my mother sang.'

Bach's 'Sleepers, wake!' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' were sung by Banbury Choral Union at Banbury Parish Church. The soloists were Mrs. C. R. Palmer, Mr. F. Burton (Magdalen College Choir, Oxford), and Mr. Hubert Bolton. Mr. C. R. Palmer conducted, and Mr. Eric Gritton accompanied on the reconstructed organ, which was heard for the first time at this performance.

On June 3, at 3, Mr. H. V. Spanner will give a recital at the National Institute for the Blind (224, Gt. Portland Street), including in his programme three of the Fellowship tests for the forthcoming R.C.O. Examination—Minuet from Sonata No. 1, Stanford; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; and the slow movement from Vaughan Williams's 'Sea' Symphony.

The Peterborough Choral Union and the Orchestral Society joined forces at the Cathedral on May 7, performing 'The Dream of Gerontius' in the afternoon, and 'Judas Maccabæus' in the evening. The soloists were Miss Lucy Goodwin, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Stewart Robertson. Mr. A. E. Armstrong conducted, and Dr. H. Coleman assisted at the organ.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

The annual general meeting will be held on Saturday, July 18, at 2 p.m.

DISTRIBUTION OF DIPLOMAS

Members and friends are cordially invited to attend the distribution of diplomas to successful candidates at the Fellowship, Associateship, and Choir-Training Examinations, on Saturday, July 18, at 2.30 p.m. The President, Dr. H. W. Richards, Warden of the R.A.M., will deliver an address on 'The Organist as Teacher,' after which Mr. E. T. Cook, organist of Southwark Cathedral, will play upon the College organ the following pieces, selected for the January Examination, 1926:

FELLOWSHIP

Aria in F ... ... J. S. Bach
(Novello, Book 12, p. 112.)
Prelude, Fugue, and Variation (Op. 18, No. 3)
César Franck

ASSOCIATESHIP

Elegy in A flat major ... ...C. H. H. Parry
(Novello.)
Meditation in F sharp minor ... ...Guilmant
(Book 6, Op. 20.)
Prelude in G minor ... ... Stanford
(No. 2 of first set of Preludes, Op. 101, Stainer & Bell.)

No tickets are required.

An informal conversazione will be held after the organ recital, to which members and their friends are invited.

CHOIR-TRAINING DIPLOMA EXAMINATION (CHM.)

The following candidates were successful at the May examination: H. Jessop, London; A. M. Stacey, London.

A SPRING CLEANING

By ALFRED H. ALLEN

Amongst organ players there must, I think, be many busy men who, having come to a ripe catholic musicianship, feel only too often that the technique which alone could make their playing a constant delight to themselves can never be theirs in this world; and no doubt there are also some who, having reached what they call middle age, or being very young, see before them only a life devoted to the teaching of the rudiments of their art to pupils of merely middling abilities, question whether it is worth while seriously to bestir themselves. To the former I would say that I do not believe in middle age at all, only in becoming ripe and staying so; to the latter, that the larger mental alertness which comes with the growth of a sound organ technique cannot but be useful in teaching any subject whatever—in playing cricket, in driving a motor car along a London street, or in conducting their singers through 'The Hymn of Jesus' or 'Though Amaryllis dance in green'; and I trust that in this plain tale something of use may be found by somebody.

I was brought up in an atmosphere of popular Victorian music, in which such works as the 'St. Matthew' Passion, Brahms's 'Requiem,' the Organ Sonatas and Chorale Preludes of Bach, the church music of Tallis, Gibbons, Purcell, Wesley, and Stanford had no place, neither were they so much as named among us. Virtually self-taught, my only guidance came from the performances of men whose energies were chiefly spent in endless teaching and in trying to please those upon whose support they had to depend. A church festival would perhaps be distinguished from the ordinary Sunday by the performance of Dykes in F and Meyerbeer's 'Coronation March.' The organ music of Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, Smart, Guilmant, &c., and the best-known Preludes and Fugues of Bach, were always heard in the course of the year, nor were 'The Storm' and the Offertoires of Léfèbure-Wély overlooked. We always stayed to hear the Sunday evening concluding voluntary, and the beginning of the full Swell's crescendo was usually the signal for putting on our overcoats and gloves. At parties we used to sing 'Ye shepherds, tell me,' 'The Red Cross Knight,' and 'Sound the loud timbrel'; and I have tender memories of 'Come, birdie, come and live with me,' 'The Vacant Chair,' Moody and Sankey's hymns, and a pianoforte duet called 'The Musical Box.' At concerts we were thrilled by 'The Better Land' (accompanied by pianoforte and harmonium) and 'The Turkish Patrol.'

When fifteen years old, I was appointed organist to the parish church of a near-by village—after having struggled through 'Hamilton's Pianoforte Tutor' with the help of a delightful old tailor who gave music-lessons in his spare hours, and who had a keen eye and a sharp tongue for the smallest sign of budding self-conceit, and a dozen organ lessons from his son, who, employed as clerk in a merchant's office, was also organist of a neighbouring church and suffered from a deep-seated dislike for teaching in general and for Bach's Fugues in particular. The curate in charge of the church to which I was appointed was a really musical man, who spoke in warm admiration of Parratt's playing of Bach at Magdalen. We became great friends, and when I was staying in his house we used to play organ music together on his two-manual harmonium, the playing of the pedal part on the lower keyboard being always given to me, of course! One of our pieces was S. S. Wesley's Andante cantabile in G major, which he had heard the composer play on the special occasion for which it was written.

A queer, untidy sort of technique had grown out of the playing of harmonium arrangements from the Masses of Haydn, Mozart, and Hummel, the oratorios of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn, followed by Stainer's primer, Westbrook's 'The Young Organist,' and a few small things chosen from the organ works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Smart, Guilmant, Batiste, and Léfèbure-Wély. At home was played the clavier music of Bach, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. Another handful of lessons completed the equipment for my calling, and at the age of eighteen I found myself fairly started on my course.

Although it was seldom possible to give more than one or two hours a week to practising upon the organ, yet many things like the short E minor Prelude and Fugue, 'St. Anne's,' and the short G minor Fugue of Bach, Mendelssohn's second and sixth Sonatas, the first four of Rheinberger, and numberless transcriptions (some my own) were added to the store as time went on; and whilst the general effect of the playing would seem to have been tolerable enough to many people, there must often have been a sad lack of clearness and precision, particularly in the inner parts, only too plain to the discerning few.

Before coming to that imaginary line so stupidly called middle age, I had thrown aside things which I had outgrown, and in their stead was playing some of the bigger things of Bach (the G minor Fantasia and Fugue, the popular D minor Toccata and Fugue, and a few Chorale Preludes; but none of the Sonatas), the Chorale Preludes of Brahms, Parry, &c., and slighter things by Saint-Saëns and the younger French and English schools. Yet I was still largely dependent upon my youthful technique and my fairly constant good luck.

Neither was trustworthy, of course; and one or two unhappy adventures when not only they but also my wonted ease and enjoyment in extemporising altogether failed me, led to a searching examination of my organ-playing, and to an endeavour to plan a short course of daily work which would overcome the main fault, which plainly enough lay in that sympathetic interest which my left hand still felt far too strongly in the doings of my feet.

The memories of a few isolated performances of Bach's organ music furnished the pattern for my guidance. The C minor Sonata and some Chorale Preludes by Walter Parratt; the C major Sonata by H. P. Allen at New College; the B minor Prelude and Fugue by Charles Macpherson at St. Paul's, and by Basil Harwood at Christ Church. So I set to work.

First of all, everything beyond the reach of my left-hand technique was put aside, and I made it a daily habit to extemporise in three parts (chiefly two manuals and 8-ft. pedal), privately and in public, with scrupulous attention to the life and colour of the texture and a free use of non legato touch; taking care, too, that the feet moved freely about the upper part of the pedal-board whilst the hands wandered at will over their own keyboards, from one end to the other. Chorales were played with the top or an inside part on an 8-, 4-, or 2-ft. pedal stop, and some of Bach's two-part Inventions were practised upside down by the hands alone.*

The next step was taken with a few of the Inventions and the 'Forty-eight,' thus:

TWO-PART INVENTIONS

No. 5, in E flat major ...	Upper part on 2-ft. pedal stop, two octaves lower.
No. 6, in E major	Upper part on 2-ft. pedal stop, two octaves lower (except from last two notes of bar 20 to end of bar 24, and from last two notes of bar 40 to end of bar 42).

THREE-PART INVENTIONS

No. 6, in E major	Inner part on 4-ft. pedal stop, one octave lower.
No. 7, in E minor	Inner part on 2-ft. pedal stop, two octaves lower, as far as first note of bar 14; the rest on 4-ft. stop, one octave lower (except the upper A, G, F sharp near the end).
No. 9, in F minor... ...	Inner part on 4-ft. pedal stop, one octave lower.

* L.-H., upper part on 4-ft. stop, one octave lower; R.-H., lower part on 16-ft. stop, one octave higher.

'THE FORTY-EIGHT'

Book 1.

C minor Fugue ... ... Inner part on 4-ft. pedal stop, one octave lower.

G minor Fugue ... ... Tenor part on 8-ft. pedal stop.

Book 2.

E major Fugue ... ... Tenor part on 8-ft. pedal stop.

G sharp minor Fugue ... Inner part on 4-ft. pedal stop, one octave lower.

When those could be so played with ease, the following Chorale Preludes, together with the Sonatas, were practised and played as voluntaries:

'Nun freut euch.' Novello, xviii.;
'Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten.' Schübler set;
'Von Gott will ich nicht lassen.' Novello, xvii.;
'O Lamm Gottes, unschuldig.' 'Little Organ Book';

after which I tackled things more or less new to me, amongst them being Bach's $\frac{9}{8}$ Prelude in C major, A minor and B minor Preludes and Fugues, Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, Parry's 'Wanderer' Toccata and Fugue, and some late Rheinberger. Then the old repertory was overhauled, and everything made neat and tidy.

The old nervousness at the organ has gone, and in its stead there is a feeling of comfort and poise never known by me before, with a looking forward to lots of jolly work in the days to come.

If 'Choir Festivals,' why not 'Organ Festivals'? At South Croydon Congregational Church the question seems to have been asked and answered to good purpose, an Organ Festival taking place on April 19. Mr. Stanley Lucas gave a half-hour recital before and after the evening service, and the service itself included two organ solos—a Prelude from the 'Little Organ Book' and Franck's 'Grande Pièce Symphonique.' The sermon was on 'The First Organist'—presumably Tubal Cain. The recital programmes included Vierne's 'Carillon,' Mendelssohn's second Sonata, the Largo from Bach's fifth Sonata, and the Air and Gavotte from Bach's Orchestral Suite in D.

Mr. J. Enos Smith has just completed fifty years' service as organist and choirmaster at St. Mary's, Rushden. His previous post was at Souldrop Parish Church, Bedfordshire. His house was at Stanwick, and in order to do his duty at Souldrop, he had to walk thirty-two miles. He did this little stroll on Sundays and occasional week-days for two years, the salary being £10 per annum—a sum which must have very nearly paid his boot-bill! His first organ pupil, by the way, was Dr. Jolley, of St. George's, Hanover Square. Mr. Smith has had a varied and active career, and we wish him many more years of useful work.

A very interesting programme was given twice on April 29 at the Parish Church, Shillingstone, Dorset, the chief items being extracts from 'The Dream of Gerontius,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' Smart's Te Deum, and violoncello and viola solos (Mendelssohn, Sammartini, and Saint-Saëns) by the Rev. E. Capel-Cure and Mrs. Capel-Cure—a notable scheme to be successfully carried through by the folk of a small country parish. Mr. Alexander Popham directed and played the organ.

The organ at Tabernacle Church, Aberystwyth, has been rebuilt. Mr. H. F. Ellingford gave a recital at the opening ceremony, playing Gigout's 'Grand Chœur Dialogué,' Bach's G minor Fantasia and Fugue, the Finale of a Stanford Sonata, and some transcriptions.

Bach's 'God's time is best,' Holst's 'Two Psalms,' and Mozart's G minor Symphony will be performed at St. Mark's Church, Reigate, on June 28, at 8 o'clock, conducted by Mr. J. E. Gomersall, with Mrs. R. W. Shaw at the organ.

The organ in Clapton Wesleyan Church has just been renovated by Messrs. Gray & Davison (the original builders), and is now a two-manual with twenty-five stops.

On the occasion of the London Society of Organists' visit to St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, on June 6, Mr. Herbert Hodge will give a recital (four o'clock).

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have just erected an organ in St. Hildeburgh's, Hoylake, Cheshire—a three-manual of thirty-two stops.

RECITALS

Mr. John Connell, Town Hall, Johannesburg—Marche Héroïque, Lemare; Finale (Symphony No. 2), Vierne; Imperial March, Elgar; Dithyramb, Harwood; Rhapsody, Harvey Grace; Grand Chœur Dialogué, Gigout; Andante and Finale (Sonata No. 7), Rheinberger; Second Suite, Boëllmann.

THE ORGANS IN TOLEDO CATHEDRAL: I.—THE ORGAN OF CHARLES V.

By ALBERTO MERKLIN.

SHOWING THE ORGAN OF THE EMPEROR CHARLES V.

The organ of the Emperor Charles V. in Toledo Cathedral is one of the oldest in Spain. It was constructed in the most glorious epoch of the country's history, for a Cathedral of great wealth, by the most famous builder of his day.

After having finished the case in 1543, the Chapter placed the construction of the organ in the hands of Gonzalo Hernandez de Cordoba, who died before the work was completed. Juan Gaytan, a Toledan, finished the organ in 1549. No less than six years were occupied in it construction. Naturally an organ-builder of that period would not only make the pipes, wind-chests, bellows, &c., but would also undertake the forging of the nails and necessary parts, prepare the leather for the bellows, and shape the bone for the keys.

The organ-builder was considered as an employee of the Cathedral, and he had his own workshop in its precincts. It is interesting to read in the old documents what is said of the founding of the metal for the pipes, in which the builder was assisted by a number of the Canons. They melted with the tin, not only lead, but also a considerable quantity of silver.

To one accustomed to modern instruments, the exterior of this organ presents an unusual appearance, for the case is entirely of stone, in a style transitional between Gothic and Renaissance, the typical Spanish style of the end of the 16th century known as Plateresque. The architecture is Gothic, but much of the ornamentation, particularly the cresting, is Plateresque. The emblazonries—the double-headed eagle—are those of Charles V., who was Emperor of Germany as well as King of Spain. The trumpets en chemade were added at the beginning of the 17th century, when the organ was cleaned and overhauled.

This organ has two manuals of forty-five notes (the bottom octave containing only eight, omitting C♯, D♯, F♯, and G♯), and a pedal-board of thirteen double notes giving a full octave with all its semitones. One of the peculiarities of this pedal-board is that each note has two keys instead of one. The pedal stops are divided into two groups, one of which sounds on the keys marked I. (inf.), and the other group sounds on those marked II. By this ingenious disposition the player is able to prepare two combinations of stops on the pedals—the heavy contra-basses to support the harmony of the manuals, and the stops sounding on the other set of keys with 2-ft. and 1-ft. registers and clarions to bring out the cantus firmus as spoken of by Prætorius in his 'Syntagma Musicum.'

Spanish organ-builders, even to this day, name their stops, not by feet, but by 'empan.' Each complete register in all old Spanish organs had two stop knobs—one on the left for the bass, and one on the right for the treble. The following specification gives the complete registers rather than their division into treble and bass :

MANUAL I.

1. Flautado de 26 (Double Open Diapason, 16-ft.).
2. Flautado de 13 (Open Diapason, 8-ft.).
3. Violon de 26 (Stopped Diapason, 16-ft.).
4. Octava (4-ft.).

Reeds added at the beginning of the 17th century, en chemade (horizontal).

5. Trompeta Real (Trumpet, 8-ft. Real = Royal).
6. Clarin de Campaña (Clarion, 4-ft.).
7. Clarin Claro (4-ft.).
8. Clarin Brillante (2-ft. and 4-ft.).
9. Trompeta Magna (16-ft., Treble only).

MANUAL II.

1. Flautado de 26 (Open Diapason, 16-ft.).
2. Flautado de 13.
3. Violon de 13 (Bourdon, 8-ft.).
4. Octava (4-ft.).
5. Octava Tapada (4-ft., Stopped).
6. Flauta Travesera (8-ft., Treble only. Two pipes to each note).
7. Quincena (2-ft.).
8. Docena y Quincena (2⅔-ft. and 2-ft.).
9. Nasardos (eight ranks).
10. Nasardos (five ranks).
11. Llenos (eight ranks).
12. Corneta Magna (Treble. Seven to thirteen ranks).

REEDS (inside the Organ)

13. Trompeta Real (8-ft.).
14. Trompeta Magna (16-ft.).
15. Bajoncillo y Clarin (8-ft. and 4-ft.) (Bassoon).
16. Violetas (8-ft. A kind of Vox Humana).

4. Contras de 13	8	4. Clarines	8
5. Contras Octava	4	5. Clarines en Quincena ...	2

Contras = Pedals.

This organ has no couplers, no swell, no tremulant. One noticeable feature of the action is its lightness of touch, allowing of rapid execution without fatigue to the fingers. The naturals are black and the sharps white. We are astounded to find that the 32-ft. Open was made in the middle of the 16th century.

In the archives of the Cathedral is preserved a document describing the inauguration of the organ. The Chapter sent to Lois Albero, an organ-builder, of Murcia, to come and examine the instrument. After speaking most favourably of the work of Juan Gaytan, he added that it showed ignorance on the part of the builder to make a pedal-board of an octave complete in all its semitones, and was a needless expense; for with a pedal consisting of the notes C, D, E, F, G, A, B♭, C, one could play all the music that existed, or which would exist, in the world. This document is signed by Lois Albero, a notary of Toledo, and a number of priests of the Chapter, on November 29 (?), 1549.

The method of blowing the organ is very original. The bellows are mounted above a kind of bascule bridge on which the blower promenades. Each end of the bridge in descending forces the air from the feeders into the bellows.

Some may ask why this organ has remained so many years in its original state. The Cathedrals of Spain, especially that of Toledo, in the 18th century were so wealthy that their Chapters, instead of repairing their old organs, built new ones. Furthermore, in the 17th century they installed the choirs in the Nave,* after which transformation the organ was placed close to the singers, and almost always at one side.†

In Toledo Cathedral there are still two other large organs, each with three manuals, but consideration of these must be reserved for a subsequent article.

* As in Westminster Abbey. Oviedo is believed to be the only Spanish Cathedral with the Choir east of the crossing.—Translator.

† Gerona Cathedral has the organ west of the Choir.—Translator.

Letters to the Editor

'SOMEWHERE FARTHER NORTH'

SIR,—I am always interested in the writings of 'Feste,' under the heading 'Ad Libitum,' but never dreamt I should have the honour to provide him with a text for a long and interesting article by my innocent notice in the London Evening News. Perhaps I may explain that most of the subjects I touched on in that notice were suggested by the Editor of the paper. After reading the gentle chidings of 'Feste,' I do not wish to withdraw or modify any of the opinions I expressed. On the contrary, I would like still more positively to assert that in tone, in quality of tone, in volume of tone (even outside 'The Messiah'), in attack, in subtlety of expression and delicacy of nuance, in diction, in the speed with which they learn new works, and in their devotion to their societies' activities, the choral organizations of the North are vastly superior to anything the South has yet produced. Perhaps I ought to say that my actual working experience of big choirs has been confined to the Manchester Hallé Chorus (thirty-six years), the Birmingham Festival Chorus (1903-6-9-12), and several years with the Bradford Festival Chorus and the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. I know that my views are shared by most of the eminent composers of to-day, and by many of our distinguished conductors. (I am sure I shall be forgiven for not quoting names.)

Early in his notice I find 'Feste' 'trotting out'—if I may use the phrase—'The Messiah,' as though we in the North lived on this work. It is true that it is popular in the North, and at Christmas-time is frequently heard; indeed, most choirs could, and many do, sing it without rehearsal. Does that ever happen in the South? Later on 'Feste' says:

> 'Comparisons are of little use unless they are based on performances of the same music, or at least a similar type of music, given under the same conditions.'

Naturally, such an opportunity for comparison would be quite impossible to secure, so I can only fall back on reputation—if 'Feste' will admit that repute is not always and entirely fictitious.

The critics are quoted as being all against the Southern choirs, so I will not adduce their evidence. But there are one or two other facts which may help us. Did anyone ever hear of a South country choir coming into the Midlands or North to sing an important work? On the contrary, Leeds, Bradford, Manchester, Sheffield, Huddersfield, Newcastle, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and, I believe, Hanley, have all sent their choruses to London to sing the choral masterpieces of the past and present. Is it likely that concert-promoters would have incurred the expense involved simply to provide picnics for the North? Again, has it ever happened at a competitive festival that a representative choir from the North has been beaten by a Southern choir? And why is it that invariably the judges from London when adjudicating at Northern festivals find themselves short of superlatives to express their admiration? I need not give examples, the records of the Musical Times abound in such eulogies. 'Feste' rather gives his case away when he alludes to the 'temperamental differences' between North and South. The gist of my notice was just this difference in temperament, which I said accounted for the superiority of North over South. Never have I believed that heaven showered gifts of voice and musical instinct on the North and withheld them from the South. Environment and temperament are the two factors which account for the difference. By environment I mean that for the last sixty or seventy years choral societies, large and small, have been abundant in the North, whilst it is only in quite recent years that London and its suburbs have taken choral singing seriously. To Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the Midlands chorus singing is a necessity, whilst to the South-countryman it is still, more or less, a luxury. On many occasions I have talked with London conductors of large societies on the nature of their musical material, and invariably have received the impression that there was too much of the dilettanti element in their constitution, and too little of the hard-working devotion which characterises choruses in a higher latitude.

After a diversion on musical festivals in the South, with which I quite agree, 'Feste' returns to the charge when he says:

> '. . . the popular opinion is that the North is blessed with better voices than the South—certainly the choralists in that part sing with more power.'

In no part of my notice did I imply that 'power' was the chief factor in choral singing. What I did claim for the North was that they (the singers) were quick to master the new choral technique inaugurated by Elgar in his 'Gerontius' and 'The Apostles,' and by Bantock in his 'Omar Khayyám.' I said:

> 'This new development required a far greater range of emotional expression and increased power of dramatic expression, and a command of many shades of tone-colour; further, that it required almost as much equipment for the chorus as for the soloist.'

I never alluded to 'sonority, tonal splendour, vigour, power, vim, pep [we don't use this word in the North], dynamics, energy, and all the other synonyms for force,' as being the main essential for good choral singing. If I had to name the most precious accomplishment a choir could possess, it would be a combined power of intimate, personal expression, such as is needed in many numbers in 'Gerontius' and 'The Apostles.' May I be excused if I digress for a moment to recount a personal experience in connection with what is called the 'new technique'? It was a Saturday afternoon in May, 1903, the place Bettws-y-Coed, whither I had been invited by Sir Edward (then Dr.) Elgar in order to learn his views on his new work, 'The Apostles,' which I was to rehearse on the following Monday at Birmingham. Four advance scores had been prepared, one each for the composer, his wife, the late A. J. Jaeger (the Elgarian apostle), and myself. Sir Edward at the pianoforte (a wretched instrument) played from the beginning to the end, and we from time to time 'chipped' in with little phrases we fancied we could sing. At the close we were in various stages of emotional excitement, if not stupor. To me it was the revelation of a new musical world. I wanted no more Handel or Mendelssohn. The immediate effect was to convince me that the choral methods of the past would have to be revised. I realised that if the Apostles, as men, were to be adequately portrayed on the concert platform, the chorus must acquire a sincerity of utterance and an intensity of expression which I, at any rate, had not previously heard. At this distance of time I marvel at the way the Birmingham choristers threw aside their dull, heavy mechanism, and entered into the inner spirit of Elgar's glorious music, which Hans Richter described as the 'greatest work since Beethoven's Mass in D.' Since the memorable first performance of 'The Apostles,' in October, 1903, I have heard many interpretations by Lancashire and Yorkshire choirs in which the fullest justice was done to Elgar's music, and am surprised that 'Feste' should have found the singing of the Leeds Choir so faulty in appeal, sostenuto, and phrasing. I wonder if this was the occasion when, with a fine choir, a splendid orchestra, and picked soloists, the hall was almost deserted? If it was, there is no cause for surprise, for sympathy with the composer, and pity for the Londoners who did not come, would chill the hearts and voices of any choralists. In the sporting section of 'Feste's' article, in which cricket and football are introduced, I can find no analogy between games and singing, although I agree that climate may affect both. But when 'Feste' uses the phrase, 'We in the easy-going South,' he gives me all the support I could possibly desire. And does not the example he quotes of a celebrated footballer leaving the North and requiring a season to recuperate, suggest an enervating climate which will relax the temperament, that is the very soul of a singer? I must end abruptly, feeling that I have not said half I would have wished to say.—Yours, &c.,

69, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

['Feste' writes: Evidently I gave Mr. Wilson (and perhaps others) the impression that my discussion of various choral questions was entirely based on his Evening News article, whereas I merely took it as a peg on which to hang a number of things that I have had in soak for a long time. This being so, Mr. Wilson will see that I never suggested that he regarded 'power as the chief factor in choral singing,' nor did I imply that my references to 'sonority, vigour, vim, pep,' were quoted from his article. The point I wished to make was that the choral supremacy of the North over the South is by no means so absolute as is generally supposed, and that in certain respects it doesn't exist. Nobody would pretend that we have in the South a group of choirs of the magnificence of the Leeds, Sheffield, and Huddersfield choirs, for example. But after some years of competitive festival experience, I say without hesitation that so far as small mixed choirs of thirty to sixty voices are concerned the South can show the way to the North in respect of beauty of tone and blend—everything but sheer power, in fact. I have never heard of one of these choirs beating a Northern body at a Northern Festival, but then I have not heard of any of them trying. I remember being so struck by the singing of a Hampshire choir in Weelkes's 'As Vesta was' and Elgar's 'Death on the Hills,' that I suggested to the conductor that a trip to Blackpool might be an eye-opener to the Winter Gardens audience. The reply was what might be expected: the choir was a working-class one, with neither funds nor leisure to spare. It so happens that only a week or two ago I heard 'As Vesta was' sung by a number of Northern choirs of the same size, some of considerable repute. Not one approached the Southerners in flexibility, purity of tone, or blend. And I know several Kentish and Somerset choirs able, so far as madrigal singing is concerned, to wipe the floor with anything among choirs of the same class at Blackpool.

Mr. Wilson attaches a good deal of importance to the fact that choirs from the North visit London, whereas London choirs never go North. The reason he gives, however, is not the only one. We know that Northern choirs welcome an opportunity to spend a day or two in London. No doubt they are on fire with the missionary spirit; still, they would be the last to deny that London itself is a bit of a magnet. But we can hardly imagine a London choir bursting to spend a week-end at a Northern centre. I am sure Mr. Kennedy Scott himself would be ready to go anywhere, even unto Wigan, but a call for volunteers from his Philharmonic or Oriana Choirs would probably be received with a hearty silence. And why not? With most London choralists of this kind, music means a good deal more than choral singing. Amateur chamber and orchestral music flourishes in and round London as it does nowhere else in England, and I should be surprised if a large proportion of Mr. Kennedy Scott's singers are not actively engaged in such music-makings during their spare time. Besides, when all is said in derision of poor old London as an artistic centre, it is the London verdict, the London press eulogy, that provincial choirs, no less than international stars, like to bear home in triumph. Now, a laudatory paragraph in the Hanley Signal may be just as good, but somehow . . .

Mr. Wilson's reminiscences of the try-over of 'The Apostles' are very interesting. There can be no dispute as to 'the new choralism' having been born in the North; but it has to-day some worthy offshoots in the South, as some recent performances in London of works by Bax, Delius, and others have shown.

Apropos of the Leeds Choir's singing of 'The Apostles' at Queen's Hall, I didn't wish to give the impression that it was consistently 'faulty in appeal, sostenuto, and phrasing,' I merely said:

> 'Turning up some notes I made at the time, I find that the magnificence of the tone, the balance, and the clear-cut articulation were the strong points. . . . I noted as faults a want of appeal in the quieter passages, some poor phrasing, and a lack of sostenuto in the quieter singing generally—each of these faults being of a type that we are not accustomed to find in the (vocally) less well-equipped London and Newcastle bodies,' and I remember that Mr. Ernest Newman's criticism in a Sunday journal was to much the same effect. As to that half-empty hall: would the Leeds Choir draw a big Yorkshire audience on a hot summer afternoon? I think not. But they would be too wise to try. I don't think any crack provincial choir would find a lack of listeners in London on a Saturday. The Glasgow Orpheus, for example, is able to pack Queen's Hall twice on a Saturday—and with comparatively little direct support from the London-Scottish element.

I am sorry Mr. Wilson seems to miss my point in the cricket comparison, for the difference between a Yorkshire v. Lancashire match, and one of (say) Kent v. Middlesex, really gives us a fair analogy to the choralism of the North and South. Everybody knows that the two are widely different in spirit; but nobody pretends that the cricket of the former is better than that of the latter. And I say this regardless of the championship.

Finally, Mr. Wilson's case is based on the excellence of a group of fine and old-established choirs. I have never denied their splendour; I only wished to show that the South is not so benighted as critics appear to think. We are getting a bit tired of the stock attitude of some who really should know better. A few weeks ago, for example, even so shrewd and commonsense a critic, and so good a judge of choralism, as Mr. Percy Scholes, writing of the singing of a handful of Cambridge undergraduates at the Coliseum, remarked (I quote from memory) that of course they hadn't the sonority of the crack Northern choirs! Who in the world expected it? What basis of comparison is there between the Sheffield Choir and a little choir of undergraduates singing a few madrigals and chanties by way of a vacation hobby? And a day or two ago a correspondent sent me a long cutting from a Midland paper containing a choice specimen of the 'poor old London' type of criticism. I quote it on p. 508 of this issue.

One last point: the climate question doesn't work out quite as Mr. Wilson thinks. It merely makes Southerners less competitive, less strenuous, and less inclined to go on choir tours; it doesn't make them less good musicians, or less good singers. But it does lead to their excellences being of a different type from those of Northern choirs. And seeing that those excellences are usually in the direction of beauty of tone, which many Northern choirs are far too ready to sacrifice for power, I shall (pace Mr. Wilson) continue to stand up for the South where small local bodies are concerned.]

CHANT SETTINGS OF THE TE DEUM

SIR,—The letter by Mr. Wakeling Dry on the above subject is interesting, although I do not share his preference for single chants. The settings provided in the 'Cathedral Psalter' for the Canticles would certainly become monotonous if strictly adhered to.

May I add some examples which have proved useful, the chants being found in the 'Cathedral Psalter,' and the changes made as directed in that book's special settings? S. Wesley, Hopkins, and 'Anon.,' 1st morning (keys F, C, F); Henley, Trent, Goss (played in E♭), 7th morning and evening (thus keys E♭, A♭, E♭); Beckwith, Turle, Beethoven, 27th morning (keys D, A, D). Other selections might be made, the keys of course being related, and placed near each other in the book for convenience of the choir (who do not like chants scattered about). We also have other chant settings in MSS., and combine some of these with those in the 'Cathedral Psalter.'

By the way, the above chant described as 'Anon.' in the 'Cathedral Psalter,' is in another chant book assigned to G. J. Elvey. Which is right?—Yours, &c.,

Callington, Cornwall. L. M. GORDON.

SIR,—Mr. Wakeling Dry's letters re chants and chant-settings published in your May issue bring up a subject which has been remarkably neglected during a period when nearly every other form of music, both sacred and secular, has benefited from the 'combing-out' of the bad and the infusion of the good idiom. While articles have been written and lectures given wholesale upon the improvement in these other branches of musical composition, our village churches have been left more or less to look after themselves in the matter of Psalm-chanting, although throughout the length and breadth of our land probably no form of music is more universally used.

Without a doubt there is much room for improvement here, where the present needs would appear to be:

(1.) A new Psalter, with pointing less rigid and more evenly proportioned than most Psalters now available;

(2.) A new Chant-book, comprising chants arranged to fit the Psalms for which they are more musically appropriate, and the substitution of some of the present weak chants, by the stronger ones of modern composers.

With regard to (1), is not the old pointing largely to blame for the habit which choirs have of hanging upon the last recited word in the verse before breaking into the rhythm of the chant, thus destroying natural accent and often obscuring the true meaning of the words? Compare:

Remember how the foolish/MAN . blas/PHEMeth Thee/DAILY

with

Remember how the/FOOLish . man blas/PHEMeth Thee/DAILY;

or

For the Lord is a/GREAT/GOD

with

For the/LORD . is a/GREAT God;

or

Who shall rise ūp/IN His/HO . ly/PLACE?

with

Whō shāll rīse/UP . in His/HO . ly/PLACE?

or

But his delight is in the lāw/OF the/LORD

with

But his delight is in the/LAW . of the/LORD, and so on. The accent in pointing naturally comes on the first beat of the rhythmical bar, and the reason for placing in this position such words as 'of' and 'in' seems unaccountable. Yet in the absence of a more rationally pointed Psalter these errors are repeated Sunday by Sunday in thousands of churches up and down the land.

The Te Deum is a ground for great improvement in pointing, although it requires very delicate handling. Would not v. 6 chant better if arranged thus?

Hēaven and / EARTH are / FULL : ōf the / MAJES . ty OF Thy / GLORY.

Should not vv. 7, 8, and 9 each be sung to half of a single chant, as:

and are not vv. 14 and 15 better treated as forming respectively the first and last halves of a complete verse?

With regard to chants for such Psalms as the 29th, 46th, 48th, and 136th, the single chants set in the 'Cathedral Psalter' are much better replaced by a strong double-chant, thus better uniting the verses, and adding majesty to the dignified words. For such Psalms as 60 and 102 a minor chant of a more emotional character than the single chants set in the 'Cathedral Psalter' would more adequately express the words.

The difficulties in the way of procuring chants by later composers should be easily overcome if Mr. Dry's efforts are successful. It seems a pity that the magnificent chants in use, for instance, in our Cathedrals should be carefully conserved to their use alone, and not made available for churches, by publication.

These few suggestions are made with all sincerity, in the hope that this treasured part of our Church Liturgy may be even more enhanced by careful and devotional performance in all choirs and places where they are sung.—Yours, &c.,

NORMAN W. HODGSON.

COLERIDGE AND CLAGGET

SIR,—Notwithstanding the many articles that have been written on Coleridge, few writers have dwelt on his appreciation of music, and on his acquaintance with a remarkable Irish musician, Charles Clagget. No doubt, like so many notable men, e.g., Goethe, Napoleon, Zola, Max Müller, Grant, Victor Hugo, Macaulay, Cuvier, Andrew Lang, and others, Coleridge had a defective musical ear; but he had a keen interest in music, and even collaborated in a music-drama. He himself writes as follows:

> 'An ear for music is a very different thing from a taste for music. I have no ear whatever; I could not sing an air to save my life; but I have the intensest delight in music, and can detect good from bad. Naldi, a good fellow, remarked to me once at a concert, that I did not seem much interested with a piece of Rossini's which had just been performed. I said it sounded to me like nonsense verses. But I could scarcely contain myself when a thing of Beethoven's followed.'

We learn of Coleridge's acquaintance with Clagget from a letter written by that wonderful literary character to his brother, the Rev. George Coleridge, on April 7, 1794:

> 'Clagget has set four songs of mine, most divinely, for two violins and pianoforte. I have done him some service, and he wishes me to write him a serious opera, which he will set and have introduced. It is to be a joint work. I think of it. The rules for adaptable compositions which he has given me are excellent, and I feel my powers greatly strengthened, owing, I believe, to my having read little or nothing these last four months.'

Charles Clagget, whose acquaintance Coleridge formed in the spring of the year 1794, at the time when he was freed from military service, was a most ingenious, though somewhat eccentric, Irish composer. Not only a brilliant violinist, he was also a musical inventor, and was appreciated by Boswell, Paoli, Cumberland, Haydn, Dr. Burney, and others. As the inventor of the valve-horn, in 1788, he produced his device of tubing 'twenty-seven years before Blühmel and Stalzel (1815) patented in Germany their piston mechanism' (vide the Rev. F. W. Galpin in his 'Old English Instruments of Music'). Poor Clagget has fared badly, for while Germany claimed his invention for producing the first valved instrument, a recent writer (Mr. Cecil Forsyth) styles him 'an Englishman.'

Born at Waterford (which was also the birthplace of Vincent Wallace) in 1737, Charles Clagget became leader of the band of the Dublin Theatre in 1761, and was conductor of the Rotunda Concerts from 1763 to 1768. Between 1762 and 1765 he composed numerous songs, incidental music for pantomimes, and also detached pieces for Tenducci, La Spiletta, and Nan Catley. His Serenata of 'Paoli' was performed on October 30, 1769. In October, 1771, he went to Edinburgh, and then drifted to Manchester, where he was leader of the theatre orchestra from 1773 to 1775.

Meantime he made many improvements in the manufacture of violins and guitars, and in 1772 he devised a new method for fitting the sound-post of violins. Naturally, London was the place for such an inventive genius, and accordingly he settled in the English metropolis at the close of the year 1775. Several of his patents were enrolled between the years 1776 and 1789, including ever-tuned pianofortes, stops, chromatic trumpets and horns, &c.

At his house in Greek Street, Soho, he had a sort of museum, with specimens of his many inventions, and he gave numerous concerts to illustrate their advantages. Haydn was particularly struck with the 'Teleochordon,' or improved pianoforte, in which every octave was divided into twenty-nine gradations of sound.

His 'Attic Concert' on October 31, 1793, at the King's Arms Tavern, Cornhill, was remarkable for the appearance of Master Bridgetower, a prodigy violinist, and Thomas Attwood, who had been a favourite pupil of Mozart. Bridgetower (so well-known in connection with Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata) played a solo by Corelli to the accompaniment of Clagget's 'Royal Teleochordon.' A word-book, including Clagget's 'Discourse on Music,' was issued, containing a detailed account of the composer's inventions and improvements, especially his 'Aiuton, or Ever-tuned Organ, an instrument without Pipes, Strings, Glasses, or Bells, which will never require to be re-tuned in any climate.' The book had as frontispiece a portrait of Clagget, by J. Singleton after G. F. Joseph.

As stated above, Coleridge formed Clagget's acquaintance early in the year 1794, probably at Reading, or, as some say, at Maidenhead. In addition to composing music for four of Coleridge's songs, Clagget, in 1796, composed the incidental music for Coleridge's music-drama 'Osorio.' This latter 'serious opera' does not seem to have been published.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

'TEMPO RUBATO' v. RHYTHM

SIR,—It is refreshing to read 'Feste's' sane and well-considered remarks upon tempo rubato in the 'Ad Libitum' columns of the May Musical Times, and also 'H.G.'s' comments upon playing in strict time in his review of Dr. Robson's book, on page 421.

If I may be forgiven a personal reference, I think the wisest plan is to teach the pupil, choir, or band, to sing or play a piece in strict time at first and then apply the tenutos, rallentandos, ritardandos, or accellerandos when the correct values of the notes have been grasped. Thus would the tyro get hold of the rhythm, which means so much more than 'time.'

Of course a lot of playing or singing out of time is due to technical incompetence: but it is also due to lack of thought, and to an inertia which is content not to grasp the composer's meaning. The performer merely uses the work for the purpose of personal display.

But is not a performer often almost driven to the latter consideration? The large majority of listeners, including those set over us, our 'superiors'—incumbents, heads of schools, etc.—will tell us that if we do not wobble our time (and incidentally, our voices, also) there is no 'soul' or 'expression' in our music.

We do not want 'wooden music,' or 'military triplets,' but rhythm is the life of music. If we play with due understanding of the time, we are told that our performance is lacking in 'soul' or 'expression'; and our bread and butter depend, to a certain extent, upon the critics.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM J. COMLEY.

THE LURE OF THE VIBRATO

SIR,—Through the medium of your journal I beg to express my opinion of modern singing. I refer to the incessant tremolo upon every note and word. To my idea it is monotonous and unmusical. It in no way enhances the beauty of singing, either in good voice-production, enunciation, or any other charm of song. But to decry it altogether would be equally wrong. Take, for instance, phrases—sad, emotional, or even pathetic of character, which are very descriptive if the vibrato or agitated voice is brought in, but its iterative use from start to finish leaves no room for variety, that is so much an amenity of vocal art.

I am not alone in my views, for expert professors of singing deplore the modern style. Moderation is in most things the index of discrimination. Why not in singing?—Yours, &c.,

H. J. KING.

THE REGENT'S BUGLE

SIR,—Absence from home having prevented me from revising the proof of my letter on this subject, may I make an emendation thereto, which would otherwise have been incorporated?

I referred to Percival as appearing to be otherwise unknown as an instrument-maker, and overlooked the fact that he was in great repute about a century ago as a maker of horns of the small fox-hunting variety.

When Mr. John Jorrocks assumed the mastership of the Handley Cross Foxhounds, he brought with him 'a regler Percival, silver mouth-piece, deep cup'd.' 'Twang went the Percivals,' says Surtees elsewhere; and they therefore rank with Strads and Latchfords (Latchford being the great spur-maker of the Jorrocks era) in having attained the ideal of merit shown by the substitution of the maker's name for that of the implement.

Somewhat later, John Köhler & Son, of Henrietta Street, and afterwards of Victoria Street, were equally famous as makers of orchestral slide-trumpets and these little horns, which are nothing but the trumpet in its most 'depauperised' form. They may have been Percival's successors in business, but this I have not ascertained; as yet there is no work on English instrument-makers to serve as a counterpart to Constant Pierre's invaluable 'Les Facteurs d'Instruments de Musique' on those of France.

I would add that the date engraved on the Clementi trumpet should have appeared as '1832,' not '1838.'—Yours, &c.,

W. F. H. BLANDFORD.

A COLLECTION OF ALTERNATIVE TUNES

SIR,—May I thank you and those who have responded to my request in a letter in the May issue with regard to the proposed Alternative Tune-Book? The selection will take some time; but judging from the expression of opinion in the letters received, the idea seems to be likely to meet with general approval.

I would like to say that I have decided not to include Chants in the Hymn-Tune book, but to keep these for a future publication. I shall be obliged, therefore, if those who are good enough to submit compositions will send only hymn-tunes.—Yours, &c.,

THE POSITION OF BRAHMS'S VIOLIN SONATAS IN MUSICAL LITERATURE

SIR,—A London music critic recently gave it as his opinion that Brahms's three Violin Sonatas were 'unquestionably the greatest things of their kind in existence.' That is assuredly a gross over-statement. Excellent and indeed splendid as these Sonatas undoubtedly are, they sink into utter insignificance when compared with Beethoven's great Violin Sonatas in C minor, E flat major, and A major, the latter being the immortal 'Kreutzer' Sonata.—Yours, &c.,

CHOIRBOYS AND SCOUTS

SIR,—With reference to the letter in your April issue, containing an appeal to choirmasters to encourage their choirboys to become Boy Scouts, it will be interesting to know whether an equivalent appeal of equal weight has been issued to scout-masters urging them to induce Boy Scouts to join Church choirs. The Scout constitution, possibly, precludes any such thing. It seems reasonable, therefore, that this point should be cleared up before any action is taken by choirmasters on the lines indicated. Perhaps, through your columns, we may be favoured with the necessary enlightenment.—Yours, &c.,

CHOIRMASTER.

'MUSIC AND COMMON SENSE'

SIR,—Regarding 'Feste's' two paragraphs on my lecture at Richmond on the above subject, I do not feel quite honest towards your readers, so will you kindly permit me now to say that I cannot imagine how anyone still can attempt to sing artistically stuffed with air. It may have been the fashion for many years, but surely the more we know of the wonders of our atmosphere, and of the carrying power of pure ease in either speaking or singing, the more can we be sure that natural breathing, and much cultivation of it, is the right thing.

As to the position of the mouth, how can any face reflect the sentiment of a poem when all strained out of the very beautiful normal?—Yours, &c.,

H. J. K. AND H. K.: AN APOLOGY; AND A GLANCE AT SOME AMERICAN ETHICS

SIR,—I was certainly labouring under the delusion that 'H. J. K.' was Mr. Herman Klein, having been told so by one whose veracity I have hitherto had no need to suspect. Other people have also shared this delusion with me. The similarity of styles of their criticism (apart from my information) would have led one to suppose they were the same person. Occasional discrepancies of view which I have noted might, I thought, be explained by the fact that musical critics, like other journalists, have often—like Caliban—two voices. I apologise to both for confusing each with the other!

Apropos of 'Feste's' excellent and witty observations upon the ballad-monger, Charles Wakefield Cadman, curious tales are told about the methods whereby in America musicians' 'counterfeit presentments' find their way on to the front pages of the 'most important of these journals'; and still more curious tales are told as to what happens when musicians decline the honour of having their 'counterfeit presentments' upon the front pages of the aforesaid journals. But people say such things, do they they not? . . . And others do them, do they not?—Yours, &c.,

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The summer term began on May 4, and promises to be full of interest in its many activities. Looming large on the horizon is the week of opera at the Scala Theatre, for which most important event, important in the annals of Academy enterprise, and of real portent for the cause of opera in England, rehearsals under the practised hand and eye of Mr. Julius Harrison are in full swing. Two complete casts are in readiness for each of the operas, 'The Magic Flute' and 'Falstaff.' There will be further particulars of this great adventure to retail next month. The third staff dinner took place in the Professors' Hall at the Academy on Saturday, May 9, at which the Principal, Mr. J. B. McEwen, outlined the general work of the current term.

The benefits accruing from this function are considerable, for the heads of the various departments, to use a 'stores' expression, are able to discuss in pleasant and sociable fashion many matters that under ordinary circumstances could only come under superficial notice, if indeed at all. The Principal referred to the invaluable pension scheme, wherein young and old are enabled to partake, partly through their own contributions and still more largely by the very generous sum allocated annually by the Academy. By means of this Pension Fund, and its contributory Life Insurance Scheme, arranged on strictly actuarial lines, many of the bugbears inevitably attendant on old age are largely minimised, and its participants may anticipate peace if not plenty in their declining days. Included in the scheme for the present term are the fortnightly and practice concerts, the first of the latter series, on May 23, being under the direction of the Principal. Owing to the exigencies of going to press, details must be held over until the next issue, but it is of especial interest, for Mr. McEwen, following his usual custom, will give an address, the arresting title of which is 'Ability and Disability.' There will be the customary chamber concerts, and a number of lectures, among which may be mentioned 'Tchaikovsky and his Chamber Music,' by Dr. F. G. Shinn, on June 3, and 'The Orchestra in relation to the Voice in Opera,' by Mr. Julius Harrison, on June 17, both beginning at 3 o'clock. On June 16 an orchestral concert will be given at Queen's Hall, and if the ensemble and all-round excellence are equal to a similar performance last term, it should be well worth the attention of everybody interested in orchestral playing of the future. Mr. McEwen, the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and Sir Hugh Allen, the Director of the Royal College of Music, paid a visit to Manchester on Tuesday, May 12, in connection with the Associated Board of the two institutions, when the certificates and gold and silver medals were handed to the winners by the Lady Mayoress, Mr. Hamilton Harty being the presiding genius. Perhaps of more importance than the actual public function from a utilitarian point of view was the informal meeting afterwards, when, over a friendly cup of tea, some hundred and fifty teachers met the two heads of these national musical institutions and discussed many subjects of vital interest, subjects significant of the local work. It is a pity that the vexed question of the new buildings of the Royal Academy cannot be brought to a satisfactory issue with the Crown authorities. The growing needs of this rapidly increasing institution (may they not, without exaggeration, be called a national necessity?) deserve the immediate and sympathetic consideration of the powers-that-be. The present accommodation is exceedingly cramped. The Academy authorities are ready and willing to build, and it requires only a little vision on the part of the landlords to put an end to a suspense that has already existed far too long. Music is an integral part of the life of the nation, and a nation starved of its music cannot get the best out of its people.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The summer term opened on May 4 with an address to students by the Director, Sir Hugh Allen, who received the cheeriest of welcomes on his return from a strenuous visit to Canada and the United States. Not unnaturally, after his experiences on the other side of the Atlantic, Sir Hugh dealt with the noise and bustle of life in some of its more excitable but not necessarily more attractive forms, and one gathered that he had lived for the past six weeks under conditions which made a Royal College term (even though an office be an island entirely surrounded by practising rooms) seem an ideal place for a rest-cure.

The opening concert of the term, on May 21, was conspicuous for interesting performances of César Franck's Violin Sonata, a Bach Violoncello Sonata, and Brahms's Sextet in G. The arrangements for the term include, besides the usual concerts and recitals, the production of a new opera by Dame Ethel Smyth, a lecture by Sir Henry Hadow (under the auspices of the Union of Past and Present Students), the annual 'At Home' of the Union, and three Patron's Fund rehearsals.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

A happy function took place in the board room of the College on the occasion of the opening of the present term, when, at the invitation of the Board, the whole of the professorial staff attended an 'At-home' to meet the new Director of Studies, Prof. J. C. Bridge. The knowledge that the number of students excelled all past records no doubt played its part in augmenting the genial tone of the company present—for what conduces more to happiness than the feeling of good work done being appreciated in a manner so practical?

The next day Sir Walford Davies, Director of Music in the University of Wales, delivered the inaugural address to a crowded audience. Sir Walford's remarks were devoted to 'Rhythm,' and the following reference affords a clue to the importance of the subject: 'Rhythm is the beginning, the end, and the interval of all things in music. It is an element of the study of music which is hard to define but not hard to understand.' In concluding, he made the interesting suggestion that an album or similar book should be kept in the College in which to preserve the musical thoughts of the students who wished to contribute to it. He was keeping one in Wales, and intended to present the volume to the Welsh Library, so that a hundred years hence it could be said that in its pages were to be found the dancing thoughts of the children of the past.

Mr. John Drinkwater also spoke on the same subject as affecting poetry.

Mention of Mr. Drinkwater's name recalls the fact that arrangements have been made for him to deliver one of three lectures to students this term. The other two lectures will be given by Mr. Albert Rutherston, on the subject of 'Standard and Comparison in Art,' and Mr. Alfred Noyes, on 'The Music of Poetry.'

The light opera class, under Mr. Cairns James, has resumed the rehearsal of 'The Grand Duchess.' The play is to be given by the students during term at the Scala Theatre.

Successful distributions of certificates gained at the College Local Examinations were held recently, notably at Chester and Wrexham, attended on behalf of the College by Dr. Bridge; at Grimsby, where Mr. C. N. H. Rodwell, secretary of the College, spoke of the world-wide work of the institution; and in London, where the certificates and prizes were distributed by Viscountess Burnham.

OPERATIC IGNORANCE

A paper with this title was read on March 10 before the Musical Association by Mr. Dennis Arundell, who made a lively attack upon the composers, the audiences, and the traditions of opera. The theatre was the thing, he said. It was ready made. Within certain limits it was possible to alter it, but it could not help remaining the same theatre. A musical work need not be put into the theatre: it could be done as it stood, as a choral and orchestral oratorio; but if it was to go into the ready-made theatre the musical work would have to be adapted considerably. The first essential in opera-composing was a working knowledge of the stage. Most musicians started with the premiss that good music was the essential basis of opera. The usual argument was, 'Of course I don't bother about the stage action. The music is so glorious that I always shut my eyes when I come to that scene.' This was of necessity either very ignorant in itself, or it was a scathing condemnation of the ignorance of the composer who had bothered to put on the stage a work that was bound to be quite as effective, if not more so, in a concert-room. The whole history of opera pointed to the realisation that something was lacking, and the pathetic part of it all was that each reformer had thought he understood the treatment of the stage—or, at any rate, the treatment of music on the stage—but hardly any had grasped the all-important fact that even if the work be suitable to be presented in a theatre, there must be give and take in all the different departments.

The libretto must be in fact the most important part of the opera, for it was through this medium that the music came in touch with the stage. If the libretto was poor—at any rate, dramatically—the music could not overflow on to the stage, and the result was no true opera. If, on the other hand, the libretto was good, it took really bad music to make the work intolerable. Puccini was said to have been a bad musician: it was unquestionable that he was a first-class composer of opera—his scenas always came off. It might be said that the real musician did not write for effect, but he should if he intended to write an opera. He was for once writing in a medium which depended on effect. It was sheer hypocrisy to write for the theatre and talk of the sublime. The theatre was full of tricks. The difficulty was to master them in such a way as to make it appear that there was no trickery. Stage technique was the one essential in the make-up of an opera composer. The importance of the music had always been given more than its fair share. It was most exceptional to find a literary critic who was a musician, or a musician who had the very slightest perception of what literary criticism meant, with the result that several poetasters of the 17th century had been dismissed as negligible, whereas in reality they thoroughly understood the one thing they pretended to understand, namely, the writing of words to be set to music for stage purposes. Shadwell, D'Urfey, and Nahum Tate were regarded as shoddy writers; this was true if they were judged on a purely literary basis, but as the authors of stage songs they were admirable. Wagner thought the poem should be the starting-point, Mozart the music, the Italians—to judge by their conventions—the singers, the 17th century the scenery and machines, Lully the ballets. How could these divergent views be compatible? They could not be: they were all individually wrong, but collectively they were right.

The whole trouble was that the composer was not ready to learn; he was there to dictate. If he would only realise that he was but one of the many people concerned in the job! The average soloist was just as bad: he did not realise that it was not enough for him to do his part well; he had to do it in such a way that it was in keeping with the rest of the production. The ballet-mistress complained if there was not enough room to dance, but failed to realise that the chorus must be in that very position, and that any alteration of the proportions of the scenery would ruin the design. The scenic artist designed his scene quite irrespective of the drama. The librettist spread himself on a philosophy or a disquisition, quite forgetting that the action was held up. The composer demanded a colossal orchestra through which it was impossible for the singers to be heard. It was a tug-of-war in about ten directions.

None of the separate entities realised the necessity for working together, especially in professional companies, where there was no time for welding. It was only the amateur who had time to spare on rehearsals, but unfortunately he had not the necessary technique. The professional had the technique without the time or enthusiasm, while the amateur had nothing but keenness. Still keenness made time, and when the amateur really set himself the task and carried it through the result was better than the efforts of any professional.

Why should singers in opera be expected to have huge voices? Why write for an enormous orchestra with families of sarrusophones, saxhorns, anvils, and Chinese drums? Why demand, as Wagner did, a special theatre? Why write the voice-parts at such a consistently high level? A chamber orchestra, four singers, with moderate compasses, a small chorus—with these materials what a lot could be done! Why cry for a large opera-house in which to perform massive works? It would never pay. The only hope lay with miniature works. They could be far more easily staged, they could be adequately rehearsed, they would be less expensive, they would allow the composer, librettist, and producer to see possibilities and mistakes. Collaboration was inevitable in some degree. It was not to be expected that one man should be able to write the libretto, compose the music, design the scenery, make the dresses, train the ballet, teach the singers, conduct the orchestra, and produce the whole work, but it was possible for each artist concerned to know his own job from the stage point of view, and that would be the common ground on which all the collaborators could meet.

THE NATIONAL OPERA TRUST

DONATIONS AND SUBSCRIPTIONS APPLICABLE AS INCOME

The Trustees are: The Marquis of Londonderry; the Earl of Shaftesbury; the Earl of Clarendon; the Hon. Stephen Ogle Henn Collins; Sir Samuel Ernest Palmer; Sir Henry Simson; Sir Hugh P. Allen, Mus. Doc., Director of the Royal College of Music; Sir Landon Ronald, Principal of the Guildhall School of Music; Mr. Charles Brudenell-Bruce, hon. organizer; Mr. John B. McEwen, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music; Mr. F. B. Merriman; Mr. Charles Sims.

The formation of the National Opera Trust has been received with general approval. Some few, however, have expressed doubt as to its utility, on the ground that it will probably take a long time to collect the full capital aimed at, and that, in the meantime, if the portion obtained in the near future is to be invested and the interest thereon alone available, opera in English may die before the Trust can come to its assistance.

In reply to this the Trustees point out that by the terms of the Trust Deed all donations and subscriptions not exceeding twenty pounds are to be applicable as income, unless the donor directs or the Trustees see special reason to the contrary; and the Trustees would presumably see special reason only if they found the income for the time being sufficient for their purpose. It is further pointed out that the donors of any amount may direct that their donations shall be applied to income, or may make a donation payable by instalments over a certain number of years.

This Fund, unlike funds concerned with raising money for buildings, will be available for the objects of the Trust whenever and to whatever extent it is received—directly in the case of contributions to income, and as the interest is received in the case of capital. Were this not so, the Trustees could not have accepted their trust, for they fully realise that five hundred thousand pounds will not be raised immediately, and that their first charge is to keep the British National Opera Company going—a matter which may need their early attention, seeing that the B.N.O.C. is unable this year to have a summer season, and that (as is inevitable in a concern of such magnitude) it must have heavy overhead charges running all the time.

BANQUET TO SIR FREDERIC COWEN

The banquet organized by the Music Club in honour of Sir Frederic Cowen took place on Thursday, May 14. It had been intended to hold the event about eighteen months ago, which would have been near the date of the sixtieth anniversary of Sir Frederic's first appearance in public. The company numbered over two hundred. The chair was taken by Mr. T. P. O'Connor.

A remarkable feature of the banquet, as the Chairman pointed out, was the number of those, eminent in all the other arts, who were at the top table. They included Sir Frank Dicksee, Sir David Murray, Sir Arthur Pinero, Sir J. Forbes Robertson, and Sir Squire Bancroft. The musicians present included Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hugh Allen, Sir Landon Ronald, Sir Dan Godfrey, Mr. Albert Visetti, Mme. Kirkby Lunn, Mr. W. W. Hedgcock, and Mr. Richard Aldrich, the well-known music critic of New York. Letters of regret were read from Sir Henry Wood, who was conducting at Wiesbaden, Sir Walford Davies, who was adjudicating in Scotland, and Mr. Edward German.

An interesting feature of the evening was the singing of songs of Sir Frederic Cowen's, which he accompanied himself. It is worth while fully to refer to these, because most of them are not so well known as they ought to be, and deserve to be better known than several which have achieved world-wide popularity. Thus Mr. Ben Davies sang 'At the Mid-hour of Night,' 'An Idle Poet,' 'Love Wakes and Weeps,' 'Day Dreams,' and 'The Sea hath its Pearls'; Miss Carrie Tubb, 'Because,' 'A Bride Song,' 'Lovers,' and 'A Birthday'; and Mr. Robert Radford, 'A Border Ballad,' 'Master,' and 'Onaway! awake, beloved.'

In proposing the toast of the evening, Mr. T. P. O'Connor paid tribute to Sir Frederic's work as conductor, and laid special emphasis on the great influence he had had all over the North of England when he was conductor of the Hallé Orchestra, and also on the great work he did at Melbourne, which was a landmark in the musical development of Australia. He had accomplished as much as anybody living to give to music its proper place in the life of the nation.

Sir Edward Elgar, in seconding the toast, spoke of his long friendship with Sir Frederic, and of the many kindnesses he had received from him. He recalled the fact that one of his (Sir Edward's) first appearances as an orchestral player was when he played second violin under Sir Frederic. Referring to the many performances Sir Frederic had conducted of works of his own, he said these were always a satisfaction to him, because Sir Frederic's great characteristic as a conductor was that he did not interpose his personality between the composer and the public. He never attempted to 'edit,' as so many conductors did, or to embroider the composition he was interpreting, but always strove to let the composer deliver his own message in his own way. Sir Frederic had always asked him when dealing with one of his (Sir Edward's) new works, how he wished it done, and had always given it supremely well in that particular way and in no other.

Sir Landon Ronald referred to Sir Frederic's connection with the Guildhall School of Music, and mentioned briefly his great achievements at the Handel Festival. He announced that the Worshipful Company of Musicians had a few days previously bestowed on Sir Frederic the greatest honour at its disposal—the honorary freedom of the Company.

Sir Frederic Cowen in reply said that in the strictest sense of the word, and not all in the conventional sense, this was the proudest moment of his life. If he were to write his own epitaph, he would say he wrote a large number of bad works, but he had a large number of good friends. Referring to his past life, he said his first appearance before the public had really taken place more than sixty years ago, when he accompanied some of his own songs at a concert at Brighton. Turning to the present, Sir Frederic said he thought that much might come out of the chaos which characterised the music of to-day, and that soon the world would go back to something a good deal less clever and more understandable. In conclusion, he remarked:

> 'All I can say is that I have done my best throughout my career. It is not possible for all of us to be great, although we can all try to be so. I think, if some impecunious musical student in years to come goes to a shop to buy his own butter, and sees on the wrapper a song by a man called Cowen, and looks in Grove's "Dictionary" to see who Cowen was, and finds that he did exist and wrote a tremendous lot of music, that is about the greatest immortality that most of us can expect. But I am proud of this evening.'

London Concerts

A COSSACK CHOIR

The 'Don Cossack Choir'—a party of Russian Imperial ex-Service men, thirty-six of them—sang at Æolian Hall, on May 15, in a downright startling way. They came with the warmest Continental recommendation. Poetical German critics had directed us to look for a revelation of the features of Dostoevsky in their music-making. Is the Englishman a hopelessly prosaic animal? Anyhow, one kept thinking, not of Dostoevsky, but of the Naval and Military Tournament.

And now for a great compliment—nothing at the Olympia Tournament is more smart, dashing, efficiently prepared, or fascinatingly effective than their singing. If all the Russian Army had been like this choir, Tannenberg would never have been lost! The smartness dazzled us so that we had hardly any attention left for the music. Or perhaps it was that there was not a great deal of actual music in it. Music, perhaps, could not bear with quite such a taut efficiency. But it was all perfectly wonderful.

An imperceptible flick from the conductor (Serge Jarov) and off they shot like race-horses—or no, because they all went off together. Beside them most 'crack' choirs would look—well, Territorials beside Guardsmen. They sang anthems by Tchaikovsky and others, folk-song arrangements, and marching-tunes. But, frankly, the 'stunt' was the thing, and it was a good stunt. One hadn't known that a male-voice choir could sound so like a military band. The basses comfortably sang B below the stave. The whistling (whistling and war-whoops enlivened the marching-songs) went probably higher than the top of the keyboard. The tenors had a highly characteristic, strident tone, but it was not forced. There was a capital bass soloist. These Cossacks are certainly in for a great lionising in England; and, indeed, their singing is a first-rate musical curiosity. C.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The final concert of the Philharmonic season was given entirely to British music. The item about which interest chiefly centred was the new Pianoforte Concerto of Herbert Howells, the solo part of which was played by Harold Samuel. This solo part is so continuous as almost (but not quite) to cease to be felt as a solo part, and to merge into the general fabric. Undoubtedly the work loses in its lack of contrast between solo and orchestral colourings which the more usual alternation would have provided. Further, the themes are in every sense somewhat small ones, and the impression is soon created that the subject-matter is not important enough for the general scale of the work.

The harmonic method is on the whole diatonic—not that it uses the old Haydn-Beethoven chords to any great extent, but that a sense of key is usually present, and chromatic notes are comparatively few. The chords strike one as being much the old chords with the addition of notes; the progressions much the old ones adorned with parallel 7ths and 9ths.

The applause that broke out on the conclusion of the work brought both composer and pianist repeatedly to the platform. Probably most people present were interested in hearing a somewhat experimental work well-performed; and, indeed, as members of a Philharmonic audience, so they should be. A rude exclamation from a gentleman in the gallery has already become historical, as has the suggestion of a lady in the stalls that he was drunk. It is unlikely that, in the literal sense, this was so; but intoxication may take various forms, and the 'nerve' of a member of the audience who can thus disturb his fellow members by an offensive observation justifies reproof.

The 'Garden of Fand,' by Arnold Bax, is already pretty well known. It is delicate, and of a lovely texture. Ireland's 'Mai-Dun' symphonic rhapsody is in strong contrast—grim and bare. It had a good performance, and as it has previously been rather badly performed, one was glad to find it in the programme, and to enjoy the opportunity of hearing it pretty much according to its composer's intentions.

The 'Spanish Rhapsody' of Lord Berners, frankly described in the programme-notes as a parody, is rowdy and, in its way, enjoyable. Of Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' Symphony nothing need be said, as it is, fortunately, by now pretty familiar.

Dr. Sargent was the conductor, and deserves praise for the care he had taken in the preparation of a very heavy evening's programme.

The Philharmonic concerts of the season have constituted a fine series, and have shown a spirit of enterprise that does the Society credit. P. A. S.

KUSSEWITZKY

M. Serge Kussewitzky conducted the penultimate concert of the London Symphony Orchestra (May 11), and also a memorial concert for the tenth anniversary of the death of Scriabin (Philharmonic Orchestra, May 15). We had memories of so many brilliant London concerts conducted by this remarkable man that he must excuse us if both these evenings left us a shade disappointed. Kussewitzky had set so high a standard of exciting and triumphant energy. Anything less from him was disappointing. But at the same time it is obvious that no man can be always screwed up to that pitch.

In a good part of the L.S.O. concert we had the great man's mannerisms without quite the spirit with which to back them up. The Symphony was Beethoven's seventh, and really it was uncommonly ragged. Has M. Kussewitzky's beat the clearness desirable when orchestral concerts are, as in London, given with the scantiest of rehearsal? The conductor went through a pantomime of spiritual transports, but in the absence of solid preparation the orchestra was not at one with him, so that this fervour was not very useful. A Concerto of Vivaldi was rough. Manuel de Falla's ballet, 'Love the Wizard,' sounded better. M. José Iturbi played the pianoforte solo in Baron F. d'Erlanger's Symphonic Concerto—the work of a sympathetic patron of the arts, but not the music to enliven much a slightly unlucky evening, for it courses its fluent way with all the commonplaces of the later 19th-century music on either hand.

The Scriabin concert included the early Symphony in E, the Pianoforte Concerto, some pianoforte solos (Miss Lilias Mackinnon), and, very late in the evening, the 'Poem of Ecstasy.' It was easy to guess that most of the rehearsal time had been given to the 'Ecstasy,' and in spite of the commemorative nature of the concert, there was lacking a sense of very profound devotion to poor Scriabin, or at any rate to his earlier compositions. The Concerto, derivative though it is, is agreeable, but it needed a more showy play from the soloist.

This is not the moment (as the journalistic saying is when it is desired to shelve an inconvenient topic)—this is not the moment to discuss Scriabin's eventual position in the musical world, or the length and breadth of his scores. Enough to say that if some would gladly relinquish all rights in him to the theosophists, there were not lacking, on May 15, those who applauded everything, including some of the most pale and jejune pianoforte pieces ever written by a musician of reputation. If the early Scriabin is pretty but rather insignificant, what of the 'Ecstasy'? An unsatisfactory ecstasy for any ordinary taste, we must say—gold that turns into sand in your grasp, delight that dissolves like the mirage, the futile pursuit and the unrelished gratification of a sick dream. QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Amid the trials and failures and snatched successes of London music, the Saturday afternoon symphony concerts at Queen's Hall remain something fundamental and satisfying—like Sunday dinner. Beethoven is the beef—the eighth Symphony and the 'Emperor' on April 25, and the fourth Pianoforte Concerto on May 9. But how the pianists differed! M. d'Albert played the 'Emperor' as if he had a grudge against both the music and the pianoforte. There was first-class ability to be detected in him most of the while, but the mark f seemed to upset it. We never heard:

All we got was a noise in E flat. What a balm was Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, which Sir Henry Wood had thoughtfully placed after the Concerto. Dohnányi, at the later concert, needed no antidote. He was discretion itself in the G major, which we persist in thinking far better music than the 'Emperor.' Afterwards he played his own 'Variations on a Nursery Song,' which contain some of the most unassertive humour in music. X.

THE BUDAPEST STRING QUARTET

At their concert on Saturday afternoon, May 9, at Wigmore Hall, MM. Hauser and Pogany (violins), Ipolyi (viola), and Son ('cello) played Quartets by Smetana, Leo Weiner, and Brahms. Smetana's in E minor gave full scope to the fine ensemble and deep emotional powers of the players. Its sub-title, 'Aus meinen Leben,' without in any way removing it from the domain of pure music, gives it an added interest, inasmuch as it is an epitome of the Czech composer's life-history. It was written just after the first premonitions of his subsequent deafness had manifested themselves; at a time when, with misfortune lowering over him, his past life rose more vividly to his mind than either present or future. The first movement depicts his early, youthful, romantic imaginings; the second (quasi-polka), his enthusiasm for Bohemia's paramount national dance, which he subsequently placed on an artistic footing in a somewhat similar way to what Chopin did for Poland's Mazurkas and Polonaises. The third movement, largo sostenuto, contains memories of his betrothal and subsequent happy marriage; while in the fourth, his joy at discovering and using national melodies is dashed by the lowering cloud of misfortune and increasing deafness which manifested itself in the reiterated hearing of a single note as shown in the Finale to the Quatuor, and which finally brought about his complete mental breakdown. The Budapest players gave a temperamentally sensitive performance of this tangled life-story. Weiner's F sharp minor Quartet is cast in a more or less modern idiom, and any emotion that may have been felt is, as is the way with many modern composers, cleverly camouflaged. Its rhythmic freedom and variety were often captivating, and seemed to call for a less conventional handling of some of the themes. It was played with the utmost clarity by the composer's compatriots. The concert ended with a fine performance of Brahms's melodious C minor Quartet.

MISS HARRISON AND EVLYN HOWARD-JONES

The recital given by Miss Beatrice Harrison and Mr. Evlyn Howard-Jones at Wigmore Hall, on May 5, was more notable for achievement in the solo line than for ensemble in chamber music. The two players are both excellent musicians, accomplished and intelligent, but their temperaments are too different to combine in perfect harmony. This very quality told very much in their favour when they came to solo music, for it would be impossible to imagine greater contrast than was shown in the interpretation of Bach by Miss Harrison and in the interpretation of Debussy by Mr. Howard-Jones. The 'cellist was all gentleness, using her bow very sparingly, and stressing the kindliness and graciousness of music in which others see mostly grandeur and strength. The pianist, on the other hand, made Debussy sound as if, instead of a modern impressionist, he had been a contemporary of Handel—themes all solid, clean, and even a little hard in conception and execution. Both experiences had the attraction of novelty, and it says much for the skill of these two players that for the time being they almost reconciled us to their point of view. Miss Harrison played also a set of new Irish melodies, arranged by Mr. Herbert Hughes with his wonted felicity. B. V.

HAROLD SAMUEL

The musical conditions of the present time may not be as rosy as the optimist would have it that they are—but they are certainly not as bad as the pessimist suggests. A week of Bach on the pianoforte would have been an impossibility fifty years ago. We can think of no player who would have then undertaken it, nor of an audience which would have listened to him if he had tried the experiment. Mr. Harold Samuel bears the burden of six Bach concerts in as many days as lightly as if Bach's Fugues and Toccatas were no more exacting than the usual morceaux de salon—and every recital draws a well-filled house. In the space at disposal it is impossible to name, far less discuss, each individual performance. Preludes and fugues, toccatas, suites, inventions—all were represented in Mr. Samuel's scheme, and if the playing varied a trifle now and again, the average remained exceedingly high. Other pianists seem mostly anxious to show some special feature of Bach's music—its monumental, granitic quality; its clean sentiments; the masterly neatness of workmanship and construction; its poetic charm. Mr. Samuel has no special bias. He sees Bach as a whole, and does justice in turn to all his moods—the breadth and depth of a fugue, the merriment of a courante, the grave and solemn beauty of a sarabande. He realises as no other pianist ever did—with the possible exception of Busoni—the importance of rhythm and its function, which is not only to keep the pace going, but to synchronise movements, hold things together, and act, generally, as field-marshal of the Bachian forces. Such a sane and masterly conception gave rare distinction to every recital, and we venture to prophesy that it will not be very long before the 'Bach week' is repeated—if public opinion has any weight with Mr. Samuel. B. V.

MM. BUSCH AND SERKIN

MM. Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, who have given three rather poorly attended violin and pianoforte recitals at Wigmore Hall, are artists rather than virtuosi. Both showed themselves something more than competent soloists. M. Busch played the unaccompanied Bach Suite that ends with the Chaconne with an untroubled mastery of phrasing and intonation, and M. Serkin demonstrated that Max Reger's 'Von Telemann' Variations are not quite the academic things we thought them to be. But their sonata playing was really admirable. They chose many composers and to all brought the vital sympathy that is the first, but by no means the commonest, quality of the interpretative artist. W.

ARTHUR CATTERALL

Mr. Arthur Catterall has come to the parting of the ways—on the one hand the orchestra, on the other the career of the soloist. He has chosen the latter, and all lovers of the violin will congratulate him on this long overdue decision. As he proved conclusively at the recital he gave at Wigmore Hall at the end of last month, he has all the qualifications of a great player—excepting, perhaps, that of a romantic air and a dashing platform manner. Indeed on the platform he is modesty itself, ready to give up the most prominent position to a conductor or an accompanist, or anyone who cares to take it. When he played the Mozart Concerto in A, accompanied by a chamber orchestra conducted by Mr. Hamilton Harty, he stood at the side, and it looked almost as if the conductor's gestures were bringing out those sweet sounds from the fiddle. Perhaps wider experience will change all this. What it can never change is the wonderful intimacy of his playing and its pre-eminently musical effect. For that is his style, and the style is the man. These things gave exquisite charm to all he played—to the lofty Sonata of Brahms as to the Paganini Caprice, and to the pretty trifles he himself has arranged for the fiddle. B. V.

HEIFETZ

Once more M. Heifetz has come, has played, and has evaded a decisive test of any kind. Like his colleague and sometime fellow student, Seidel, he is an expert fiddler who apparently leaves the classics to those who like them. Not one of the pieces he played at the Albert Hall could claim any artistic interest. The nearest to something like high merit was the Grieg Sonata in C minor—a work that is both lively and picturesque, but also neither profound nor distinguished. His second item was Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, the superficial brilliancy of which reveals better than almost anything else the limitations of its composer. Then came the savoury consisting of spicy bits often reserved for encores. The best of these was a Slavonic Dance of Dvorák, and the worst a 'Stimmung' by M. Heifetz's accompanist. The violinist played all these things without a flaw, which is undoubtedly an achievement of a kind. But I very much doubt whether his audience will long remain faithful to him unless his programmes improve in quality. Moreover, an hour's music may be all that we expect and demand from a virtuoso. But there is really no need to revive all the trappings of virtuosity, and keep the audience waiting a quarter of an hour before making a start. These things may have been de rigueur fifty years ago; now they are simply bad taste. B. V.

ERICA MORINI

Three Sundays running Mlle. Erica Morini appeared at the Albert Hall under command to prove herself 'the most remarkable woman violinist the world has ever known.' A heavy sentence this, and ill-worded. Kubelik used to be a remarkable violinist. Bratza has been a remarkable violinist for several years, on account of his youth. Pachmann is a remarkable pianist. Mlle. Morini's claims do not run out of parallel with sheer music as theirs do. She is the pure musician of the violin. Her technique serves—she plays in tune and with nice tone. Her expression reveals the heart of good music. It makes Mozart sound more like Mozart than ever, Beethoven more like Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky more like both of them. With this remarkable tribute we may leave her—an artist. M.

SCHNABEL

M. Arthur Schnabel, who gave two recitals at Æolian Hall, is a mature pianist of unusual distinction. His Beethoven programme provided us with the most memorable interpretations of the master we have heard this season. M. Schnabel is no disciple of the classical von Bülow school, for which Lamond stands, nor is he a modernist in the sense that Busoni was. In avoiding either extreme, he manages to give us a Beethoven that is very much alive. We listen to his 'Appassionata' or his Op. 110, and realise that for once we have intellect and emotion in perfect assimilation. A magnificent technique at the service of a profoundly musical temperament—that is what M. Schnabel brings to the pianoforte. And the result more than justifies the reputation he enjoys in Germany and Central Europe. W.

SOME SINGERS OF THE MONTH

Miss Isa Kremer, who styled herself an 'international balladist,' gave a strange concert at Queen's Hall. Her performance would have been less unusual in a music-hall than in a concert-room, so lavish was she with illustrative gesture—and, one must add, so pronounced was the 'twang' of her tone. But if her vocal quality could not be called beautiful, she established an impression of a lively personality, and certainly made more vivid some gipsy songs by her unconventional behaviour. Her diction was perfectly clear.

Miss Ada Mylchreest and Mr. William Parnis gave a joint recital at Æolian Hall. The former has a big contralto voice, which needed levelling. Sometimes it sounded noble, at other times it was limp. The excessive difference between her open and closed vowels made the impression of two voices at work—as though the singer could not clearly choose between two courses. To improve this promising voice more attention should be paid to sibilants, and the explosive consonants should be subdued ('captive,' for instance, was sung 'capertive'). Neither hers nor her partner's choice of music was on a good enough level.

Mr. Parnis is a tenor of a certain ability already, and as he has youth on his side he may come to do quite well. He should guard against the tendency to become nasal under pressure. His Italian was good, less so his French. Generally his voice was like good steel that lacked an edge. Though it is usually unwise to suggest to a young singer any indulgence in 'storming,' Mr. Parnis could, we felt, have amplified his pleasant tones without sacrificing quality. In sum, a singer worth hearing.

Miss Lia Rosa sang some Handel and some Spanish songs at Æolian Hall. Her voice is agreeable enough, and it was good to see her aiming at breath control. But she seemed still too much the student. We were too conscious of hearing the efforts of a voice in the making.

A young singer who has made his name at one stroke is Mr. Roy Henderson—on the strength of his performance in Delius's 'Mass of Life.' And well deserved indeed was all the praise that was showered on the boyish baritone—not only for the excellence of his actual singing, but also for the highly exceptional musicianship the performance implied. He showed style and command. He was never in the slightest degree flustered. He never strained after point-making. But his clear, direct, and manly utterance was fully telling. It is not a big voice, but in most of the range it is big enough because so well used. The low notes, however, need some attention. And one has yet to be convinced that he fully understands a supported mezza-voce. Why do nearly all our singers employ a mere sospirando tone in lieu of true soft singing?

On that evening the tenor, Mr. Walter Widdop, was not on his highest level, but all in England who care about good singing must take a lively interest in this young man's career, and I for one am convinced that with reasonable fortune he is going to take a far higher place than the general public suspects. I must withdraw an opinion formerly expressed that he was a pushed-up baritone. That opinion did not allow enough for his early inexperience. He is assuredly a true tenor, not yet impeccable, but of such gifts of bigness, warmth, and manliness that it does one's heart good to hear him. At a recent social function he sang two songs of Strauss to perfection, but seemed not yet to have just the voice for 'On with the Motley.' Here he was not artful enough in the balancing of his phrases or in the reserving of his effects. The one fault about his high notes is that he makes one too aware that they are indeed high. At present he has unexploited potentialities. He is, so to speak, only blowing with two-thirds instead of the whole of his bellows. When he has learnt to widen his throat under full pressure, the world will be at his feet.

The most expressive singing heard lately was due to a Russian tenor, M. A. Alexandrovitch, who gave a recital of Moussorgsky's songs in the crypt-like St. John's Institute, Westminster—a bad music-room, unfortunately, and the singer must have been handicapped by its faults. Some, at least, of the songs were masterpieces unrivalled in their way, and here we had a singer who had an innate understanding of them. He had a 'chamber manner' which we have never known surpassed; that is, he perfectly adapted his effects to the number of persons before him. If there had been twice as many rows of seats he would, we felt, have appropriately extended his expression. In a still smaller gathering it might, no doubt, have been made still more intimate. The economy of his facial play was a memorable study for any attentive listener. In fact, a good artist!

The voice was perhaps weakish at the bottom. But it was full of music, and was shaded with the finest consideration. He could sing passionately without turning a hair, and his breath was so evenly disposed that one never felt him to be chafing his cords in the least degree. He knew the art of 'spinning' his voice, and subtle little inflations and deflations of tone gave vividness to every phrase. He essayed on this occasion nothing in the way of bravura singing, but his high notes were so well placed that he certainly could not have shouted or have sung at all disagreeably. Mr. Collingwood was the pianist, and Mr. Edwin Evans commented on the songs.

Mr. Eric Marshall sang Italian, German, French, and English songs at Wigmore Hall. This gifted singer is improving his technics, but he is still far from being master of his material. It was obvious that he was still thinking almost exclusively about tone—a consideration that is, in the finished artist, sunk in the unconscious. This haunting consideration so obscured his sense of rhythm that after a time he communicated a painful impression of helplessness. The music was pulled this way and that till much of it was shapeless. It was not the singer's fault—so we felt—but in his efforts (mainly successful efforts) towards good tone he simply could not help it. H. J. K.

ELGAR ORATORIOS

The later oratorios of Elgar are answering to the test of great music. The last twenty years have led us far from the musical region of 'The Apostles' and 'The Kingdom,' but we appreciate them all the better for the wider experience. In London 'The Apostles' has never quite dropped out of our acquaintance, chiefly owing to Mr. Allen Gill and his choir. 'The Kingdom' had not been performed in London for seventeen years until the London Choral Society, under Mr. Arthur Fagge, gave it at Queen's Hall on April 22. And very well they gave it too, considering that the music must have been a new study to practically everybody in the choir. The rehearsing had evidently been thorough, for the choir was sure of itself. There was room for a more closely-knit interpretation and a more complete revelation of the expressive depths of this beautiful music. We hope to hear everything realised in the London Choral Society's next performance, for surely there will be another, now that the ice has been broken. The solo parts were sung by Miss Miriam Licette, Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

'The Apostles' was given by the Alexandra Palace Choir and Orchestra, at the Palace, under Mr. Allen Gill. The welcome addition of a hundred and twenty singers from the Wolverhampton Choral Society helped to solidify the tone and to quicken the responsiveness of the singing, a necessity imposed by the building rather than by its native choir. A notable interpretation was secured, and it may be remarked that this was the last appearance of the choir in its old home. In future it adopts the Northern Polytechnic, in Holloway Road.

OTHER CHOIRS

The Handel Society sang better in 'Samson,' at Queen's Hall on April 25, than it has sung for a long time. Handel for the Handelians appears to be good policy. Mr. Goossens showed himself a good classicist.

The Westminster Choral Society breathed the same invigorating air at Central Hall four days later, when it gave the 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' and 'Acis and Galatea.' In between these items Mr. Vincent Thomas, greatly daring, put his choral ballad, 'The Sword of Glyndwr.'

On May 14 Oxford House Choral Society sang at Holy Trinity, Sloane Street. We may count this a concert, for the visit is the modern substitute for the old and well-remembered concerts of this choir at Queen's Hall. The appeal to the West-End for help remains, and the quality of the singing, under Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, is still an East-End offering of great price. The works performed were Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.'

The West London Evening Institutes Choral Union gave 'King Olaf,' under Mr. W. T. Oke, at Queen's Hall on May 16. There was a very good semi-professional orchestra—too good, in fact, for the choir was often unable to assert itself, for all its courage.

In the outer ring the Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society called for attention on April 28 with performances of Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander' and Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride' that had many merits. Mr. A. L. Praeger conducted. Talking of Ealing, one of the losses in our recent going-to-press crisis was the notice we had prepared of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' finely performed by the Ealing Philharmonic Society, Mr. E. Victor Williams conducting. Another was Berlioz's 'Faust,' given by the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies, under Mr. Frank Idle.

THE GRAMOPHONE

Mr. Compton Mackenzie, the well-known author, provided the paper at the concluding meeting of the present session of the Musical Association on April 21, his subject being 'The Gramophone: its Past, its Present, its Future.' A great deal of its interest derived from the fact that the paper was largely a résumé of Mr. Mackenzie's personal experiences. He said that Edison must be allowed the credit of inventing, in 1878, what in America is still called the Phonograph, though a year earlier M. Charles Cros had deposited in the French Académie des Sciences a description of a similar instrument. The name Phonograph was actually invented in 1863 for an instrument that electrically recorded and reproduced sounds. For a long while 'Phonograph' was kept as a proprietary title by Edison, and his jealousy was responsible for our present silly substitute. The first records were made on a roller or drum covered with tinfoil, and the sounds emitted were faint and unnatural. The whole device was extremely clumsy, and was rapidly passing into oblivion when Messrs. Bell & Taynton invented the method of recording with a sapphire stylus on a wax blank, and followed this up with the designing of machines for the reproduction of such records. These machines were known as graphophones, a name still used by the present Columbia Company. At first all records were 'masters': that is, they were the original wax cylinders. This, of course, meant that it was very difficult to produce records in any quantity, and also that it was very expensive. Edison continued to work on the cylinder, but towards the end of the 'nineties a German called Berliner advanced along lines indicated by an earlier inventor, named Scott, and produced the disc type of machine, in which the record of the sounds was made by a sinuous track and reproduced by a needle. This was the beginning of the Gramophone Company, whose machine, introduced as the Gramophone (a further corruption of 'phonograph'), had in England come to be accepted as indicating the generic name for all machines reproducing recorded sound.

The quality of noise emitted by these early disc-machines was truly appalling, and it was generally believed that the lateral or needle-cut records could not compete with what was known as the phono-cut, or hill and dale, method of recording and reproducing with a sapphire. At this date the cylinders were so far in advance of the discs that the attention of inventors was turned to applying the phono-cut method to discs. The result of this was the production of the Pathéphone, which even to-day had its adherents. One advantage of the phono-cut was the greater amount of music that could be got into the space. The disc slowly gained in popular favour over the cylinder, partly owing to the storage advantages afforded by discs and partly owing to their greater durableness. Then Edison brought out his Blue Amberols, which were cylinders in which celluloid was substituted for wax. They were very good, but impossibly bulky and incapable of development.

If one were asked to say what was the cause of the present dominance of the needle-cut disc one might be tempted to reply, 'Caruso.' With his glorious voice he was the first singer to adapt himself to the gramophone, and so far as musical people dimly apprehended there might be possibilities in this uncouth instrument, it was Caruso who pierced the veil of their foggy imaginations. The attitude of musical people towards the gramophone was for many years nothing less than criminally dull-witted. Here was something that could do for music what printing had done for literature, and yet the musical public allowed it to be exploited by commercial interests with as little concern as if they were watching the exploitation of a patent medicine. This lack of interest was all but fatal, and even now it was difficult to tell how, except by Divine Providence, we had escaped seeing the gramophone and all connected with it as rapidly and as dreadfully debased as the cinematograph. However, we had escaped, and to-day, when the recording companies are producing every month more good music than they formerly produced in five years, they were never so prosperous. Moreover, we had the satisfaction of knowing that the production of good recorded music in England exceeded every month by far the united production of the rest of the world. Not merely was the best music produced by us, but we produced it in the best way. Nothing that was being done by wealthy men and women to cultivate the public taste in other arts could compare with what the public was doing to cultivate its own taste in music by means of the gramophone. Still, the fact remained that precious years had been wasted, precious years during which we might have made such an advance towards perfection, precious years during which the gramophone was allowed to become a synonym for all that was vile in the world of sound.

The development of the gramophone was seriously imperilled by the substitution of the internal for the external horn. The latter offended against gentility. People were ashamed of the gramophone, and wanted it not to look like a gramophone. Hence all the camouflage with elaborate cabinet work, hence the distortion of sound by the internal amplifier. There was no comparison between the quality of the sound developed by an external horn and that developed by an internal amplifier. Unquestionably the old metal horn was harsh, but it was always reproducing more accurately the badness of the recording, and it was always the methods of recording that were slowly but steadily improving, for which improvement the internal amplifier was given the credit. The external horn was ugly, it was cheap, it was blatant and overpowering in a room, and it vanished from polite society; but it must be acknowledged that an external horn model of a gramophone costing perhaps nine pounds was better than a pot-bellied cabinet costing ten times that amount. During the last fifteen years no real improvement had been effected in the reproduction of recorded sound, apart from the improvement in the methods of recording and pressing the discs. Once the public could be persuaded to return to the external horn, there were many improvements that were waiting for them, though the horn model as it stood at present could be regarded only as a miserable makeshift.

The effect of the gramophone, said Mr. Mackenzie, could not fail to be unimaginably great. It had already killed the tyranny of the pianoforte. It was because he believed in the existence of thousands—nay millions—of people who did not know their own capacity for enjoying and appreciating music that he believed in the power of the gramophone. Therefore when he was made aware of an inclination to despair of its potentialities, he must oppose such inclination. He refused to admit that we had even begun to deal with the problem of perfect reproduction, and if we sat down in our rooms playing to ourselves orchestras of ghostly dolls, and listening to the echoes of chamber music far away, we were just shirking the problem. The way of improvement was beset with difficulties. The publication of records was in the hands of a very few firms, added to which the number of individuals who had any practical experience of recording was small, for no secrets were more strictly guarded than those of the recording-room. The English recording companies were doing everything to justify what amounted to a monopoly, but as regards the quality of the machines, never were the evils of mass production more apparent. Any new invention that might involve an extensive change in the huge plants they had laid down, was inevitably shelved. Directors would tell us about the vast sums they devoted annually to research work, but what they meant by research work was the improvement of any existing method of sound reproduction, or the application of any new method that would not conflict with their working resources and would show a greater profit. We were getting splendid music, and we were getting better recording every month, but the instruments themselves were still twenty years behind the recording-rooms. Grave dangers threatened from commercialism interfering with the progress made by the enthusiasts of the recording-room. There was a growing inclination on the part of each company to record for its own machines, which meant that in the near future further progress in recording would be sacrificed to the commercial exigencies of the moment.

What were the criticisms that a disinterested musician would pass upon the gramophone as it now stood? Taking singers first, he would complain that all the overtones of the human voice were lost. This was often, but not always, true. On the new Edison machine the reproduction of singing was so life-like that frequent tests in concert-halls with the singer and the record of his singing, performing side by side, ended by completely puzzling the audience as to which was the singer and which the gramophone. This conspicuous success might lead one to suppose that the phono-cut disc was still superior to the needle-cut. This might be true for the solo, though the reason for the superiority was to be sought in the badness of the machines used for reproducing the needle-cut discs. But when we came to more than one instrument, the machine performing the phono-cut became definitely inferior.

The lecturer said that his own impression was that the loss of overtones could be largely recovered by compelling the sound-box to travel straight across the disc without describing the arc which the general design of instruments at present compelled it to do. He possessed an instrument designed by an ingenious amateur in which the horn was fitted to the sound-box, and was supported at the wide end by floats riding in mercury. The device entailed a good deal of bulk and a good deal of clumsiness, so that it was not an attractive commercial proposition, but it gave a better reproduction than anything he had heard. Unquestionably the music was all on the record if one could only bring it out, but just how much music was there he confessed he did not know, until a few weeks ago another amateur confided to his judgment another improvement so simple that he could not understand why nobody had thought of it before. He was not yet at liberty to disclose its nature, but it would soon be placed at the disposal of every gramophonist, who for a trifling expenditure would be able to improve his reproduction to an extent that would revolutionise recording. By its means, said the lecturer, he had been able to realise possibilities in gramophonic reproduction that he had dreamed of but never hoped to hear in his life-time, so slow during the last quarter of a century had been the progress compared with what it should have been, and, but for the apathy of musical people, could have been. He felt confident that within a very short time we should be much nearer to the perfection of which we dreamed. We should be tackling problems much more subtle, we should be seeking for some way to spread out the orchestra, we should be thinking it worth while to get a whole symphony on two sides of a record, we should be devoting ourselves to the elimination of all scratch without sacrificing any tone. Had not enough been said to suggest that in these days the gramophone was worthy of serious attention?

Competition Festival Record

MORECAMBE.—Writing in the Manchester Guardian on this year's Festival (May 7-9), Mr. Samuel Langford said:

> 'Twenty years ago the late R. G. W. Howson and the late Canon Gorton, following their exploration of the then little-known Brahms choral songs, had applied the same spirit of research to the work of Cornelius in this medium, and on May 17, 1905, there was sung for the first time in England, before Sir Edward Elgar and the late Dr. W. G. McNaught, Cornelius's "O Death! thou art the tranquil night," in a translation from Heine by Canon Gorton. Much of the modern development in choral writing, notably by Elgar and Bantock, dating from about that year, is traceable to the influence of Brahms and Cornelius.'

This great part-song was again made a test in the chief choral competition, with Wilbye's 'Why dost thou shoot' and Julius Harrison's 'Shepherd, what's love, I pray?' There was something of tradition, too, in the winning of the first place by Barrow Madrigal Society (Mrs. T. M. Bourne). Skipton Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Hume Wrathall) and 'Carliol' Ladies' Choir from Carlisle (Mr. W. H. Reid) won other leading competitions for neighbouring counties. Carlisle choirs played a conspicuous part in the Festival. In the chief male-voice class Colne Orpheus Glee Union won the highest marks—98 per cent. In the solo competitions considerable interest was aroused by an adjudicator's criticism of platform deportment. He said that 'it was not nice to see men clasping their hands in front of them like giggling flappers,' and went on to declare that he had made up his mind not to give prizes to those boys who sang 'like conceited little prigs.'

This year's MIDLAND FESTIVAL, held at Birmingham on May 11 to 15, was for children only, the highest age-limit being seventeen.

The opening days of the Festival were given over entirely to dancing. As in past years, the weakness of this competition lay not in the quality of the dancing, but in the tepid handling of the accompaniments. With two or three exceptions every team had to contend against pianoforte playing that was rhythmic enough, but not spirited, and the dancing suffered in consequence. In her adjudication, Mrs. Kennedy said she had heard a penny whistle and a concertina used instead of the pianoforte with more satisfactory results. In the dances for rhythmic expression the music chosen included a two-part Invention and a Fugue of Bach, and Beethoven's Menuetto movement from the G major Sonata, Op. 49.

Two new classes in the music competitions proved successful. The first, a competition in which the candidates were asked to play the pianoforte part of a concerto while the adjudicator played the orchestral accompaniment, was Mr. Frederick Dawson's idea. The competition took the form of a kind of music-lesson in public, and was intended as a test of musicianship and sensibility to the adjudicator's suggestions in the matter of interpretation.

Another competition new to the Festival was a class for instrumentalists in ensemble playing. A Minuet of Mozart's was set as test-piece to be performed by not less than five players on string instruments in combination with pianoforte. Only three groups entered, but the achievement of the winning group—the Moseley Septet—showed how much can be done in this kind of work under a teacher well versed in her art.

The school choirs, which sang under the adjudication of Mr. Stanley Roper and Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill, combined on Thursday evening in a performance of Sydney H. Nicholson's cantata, 'The Jackdaw of Rheims.'

The choir from the Birmingham Royal Institute for the Blind again provided the loveliest singing of the Festival.

LEITH HILL.—This Festival breathes a happy spirit, for there is camaraderie among the musical forces in and around Dorking, where the competitions were held on April 21-23. Five of the principal contestants—Dorking Madrigal Society, Dorking Oriana Society (the prize-winners), and choirs from Ashtead, Epsom, and Leatherhead—joined at the end in a performance of their test-study, the 'Gloria' choruses from the B minor Mass. Dr. Vaughan Williams, who conducted, brought some of his Bach Choir singers to join in, and the solo parts were sung by three of the English Singers—Miss Flora Mann, Miss Lilian Berger, and Mr. Norman Stone. Dr. Adrian C. Boult was present, and in a speech said there were four festivals which stood out in merit, for they worked on the principle that the greatest moment was from the first to the last minute of the combined rehearsal, and that even the full performance was subsidiary. These four were the 'Mary Wakefield' Festival at Kendal, and those at Leith Hill, Petersfield, and Winchester.

PETERSFIELD.—Dr. Adrian C. Boult's tribute to this Festival, spoken at Leith Hill and quoted above, was fully deserved. The overwhelming interest attached to the combined singing and to the imported concert work lessened the significance of prize-winning without taking the edge off competition. Dr. Boult was the master of rehearsal and performance at three of the four concerts (the first was given by the children), during which he conducted six choruses from 'Elijah,' three Vaughan Williams folk-songs, five Terry shanties, Parry's 'Come, pretty wag, and sing,' 'The Mount of Olives,' the 'Hallelujah' Chorus, Morley's 'See mine own sweet jewel,' the chorus 'Blessed Jesus,' from Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' R. T. Woodman's 'Falmouth,' Wilbye's 'Adieu, sweet Amarillis,' Byrd's 'I thought that love had been a boy,' Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea' (with Mr. Harold Williams), Brahms's 'Wherefore hath the light been given,' Colin Taylor's 'Dream Pedlary,' Elgar's 'After many a dusty mile,' Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols,' and Dyson's 'Praise'; with the orchestra, Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mozart's in G minor, and Beethoven's second, Vaughan Williams's Overture 'The Wasps,' Haydn's Violoncello Concerto in D (with Mr. Ivor James), and Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture. Mr. Herbert Heyner, Mr. Harold Samuel, and Mr. Geoffrey Shaw, the competition adjudicator, all helped, and Mr. Arnold Goldsborough had a busy time as accompanist. Such a Festival, given almost entirely by, or for, villagers, was a credit to Hampshire.

ISLE OF MAN.—The thirty-fourth Manx Festival at Douglas was held on April 20-23. It was in every way a success, and has again deserved the tribute we paid to it last year. It is due to this well-organized Festival that the Isle of Man ranks high as a centre of music. Not many days after the Festival was over a printed twenty-three page pamphlet was issued (copied from the Isle of Man Weekly Times) giving, for sixpence, a full report of the entries, results, and adjudicators' remarks. Other Festivals might take note of this business-like and useful proceeding.

LEWES (April 22, 23).—This Festival, organized by the executive of the Sussex Women's Institutes, is entirely choral. The two days were shared by schools and village choirs. Entries were larger than ever. There were no prizes, and no actual winners, two grades of certificates being the only award. Excellent all-round form was shown, but even better was the jolly 'happy family' spirit. At the close of the village choirs day, the competitors were massed for a concert under the live conductorship of Dr. Harold Darke.

The WORCESTERSHIRE Musical Competitions were held at Great Malvern from April 28 to 30.

Their strength lay in the singing of the village choirs and in the folk-dancing, which here attains a zest and naturalness, particularly in the adult classes, not to be met with in the larger centres of population.

The combined performance is also made much of, and the massed children's choirs gave a noteworthy performance of the cantata, 'The Moon,' adapted by Dr. Whitaker from neglected arias by Purcell. The tone of the young singers was free from hardness, and entirely beautiful. The village choirs were combined under Sir Ivor Atkins, the musical director of the Festival, in Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' the orchestra being drawn from local resources with a strengthening of Birmingham players. Mr. Godfrey R. Brown, of Belfast, adjudicated in the musical competitions, and Mrs. Bruce Swanwick in the folk-dances. Some plainsong competitions peculiar to these gatherings were adjudicated by Father Anselm.

Mr. A. J. Sheldon, the critic of the Birmingham Post, addressed the competitors on the opening day. The Hon. Mary Packington, to whose fine and enthusiastic work over many years these competitions are greatly indebted, announced that owing to the claim made by other interests she was compelled to resign active support. Her interest in the Festival would, however, continue.

YORK (May 7-9).—This long-established Festival had a record entry. On the first day village choirs—male, female, mixed, and church—had a busy and apparently happy time; the second day was devoted to schools of various kinds; and the Festival wound up with some exciting contests between town choirs. Although the old title, 'York Choral Competitions,' is retained, there is also a promising section for instrumental ensemble.

The WILTSHIRE Competitive Association held its eighth musical Festival at Trowbridge on May 9 to 13. The results were very encouraging both materially—ability, technical skill, &c.—and spiritually. Indeed, the spirit which prevailed reminded one not a little of the early Festivals of Miss Wakefield, in Westmorland. Two points of special interest stood out from the usual course of events. In the first place there was the high degree of efficiency of the instrumentalists, who seemed to understand their business thoroughly, and also to know what was expected of them. Elsewhere a good 'cellist or a good violinist may be heard in the 'cello or violin classes, only to disappear completely from the Festival. At Trowbridge the same 'cellist would take part in trios and quartets, appearing finally in the orchestra to support the massed performances of the choirs. This is just what a good Festival ought to do—bring together players of all instruments and give them every chance of using their skill for the benefit of the greatest possible number. The other point concerns the freedom of choice given to the competitors more frequently than, probably, in any other Festival. There is always some danger in allowing choirs and instrumentalists too great a latitude in this respect. The only way by which we can influence musical taste and direct it towards a worthy end is by making competitors prepare music of high quality. The Wiltshire competitors did not abuse the freedom that was theirs, and their choice was that of people with a natural flair for good things. As often happens at these Festivals, a particular choir passed through very dramatic moments. It had won a certain competition for two years in succession, and had great hopes to win again this year—but lost by only a small margin. The singers, however, made up for their defeat by a handsome victory in another class.

Small choirs from outlying districts also took part in some competitions with credit, and it is to be hoped that their example will be followed by others. They are a class which deserves to be nursed with care.

THE BORDER (May 9-16).—Divided, as usual, between Hawick and Galashiels, the six-year-old Border Festival was more than usually successful. Entries had increased by twenty-five per cent.; audiences were large, 'standing-room only' being the order at several sessions; and with excellent organization at the back of it, the event was much enjoyed by all concerned. Out of a generally high level, we single out for special mention the pianoforte classes (junior and open) and the violin and pianoforte class. In both the playing was on a level rarely reached at Festivals.

The BERKS, BUCKS, AND OXON Festival was held at Banbury—on the extreme edge of the county, and in consequence entries were not so numerous as could have been wished. This is, in any case, one of the minor Festivals, but not the less interesting on that account. The true believer in the competitive movement does not ask—Where are the best choirs? but, Where is the greatest need? Festivals can do far more useful work in Berkshire than in Lancashire. Where opportunities to hear good music are few the festival is a necessity. Moreover, at Banbury we had the rare experience of being at the root of things, and the adjudicators were able to trace failings in performances at their source. The quality of the voices was excellent, and must have confirmed many in their opinion that there are sweeter, more musical, voices in England than anywhere else. Test-pieces were, on the whole, well chosen. A possible exception was the duet for boys' voices—C. Wood's 'My Dove'—the long, pedal notes of which proved rather more than the competitors could comfortably manage. It might seem a daring thing to select Bach's 'God's time is best' as a test for choirs from places of less than a thousand inhabitants. But the result justified to a great extent the committee's confidence. The adjudicators were H. C. Stewart, J. W. G. Hillaway, the Rev. B. C. S. Everett, and Dr. Herbert Brewer.

The last six weeks have seen the competition festival system at its height. There never has been so much activity in the history of the movement. A severely limited record such as this must confine itself to stating, in most cases, the fact that a festival was held. The most important of those that we propose to dismiss summarily and, we hope with pardon, are: STRATFORD, E. London, where entries fell comparatively low—to three thousand five hundred (Mr. John Graham, for forty years the hon. secretary, attributed the falling-off partly to dancing); FROME, where the Mid-Somerset competitions sprang suddenly from a three-day to a six-day affair; ALDERLEY EDGE, a young Festival that has grown rapidly to its five days; three-day Festivals at CHIPPING NORTON (Stour Choral Union); WHITBY (the Eskdale); CHESTER (the Wirrall and Eddisbury); TUNBRIDGE WELLS and LEWES (two East Sussex Associations); TONBRIDGE (the Kent Festival); GUILDFORD (the Surrey open competition); and many good Festivals of two days' duration. A new Festival at BRIGHTON, held in May, made a good beginning.

FESTIVALS IN SCOTLAND

The first BUTE, CUMBRAE, and KYLES Festival, held at Rothesay, occupied two days, and made an excellent start, A surprisingly good standard for a first Festival was shown, and public interest was considerable.

The gigantic GLASGOW Festival, which ran for over a fortnight, night and day, and attracted fourteen thousand competitors, the number of competing choirs being two hundred and eighty-eight, will be fully reported next month.

The third MORAYSHIRE Festival was held at Elgin, and this year occupied a full week. A good level of performance was maintained, the children's classes being particularly good. A (literally) infant group from Elgin Day Nursery was described by one of the adjudicators as unique, and only to be accounted for by its presenting itself during the lambing season. The most notable feature of this Festival is the sustained and enthusiastic public interest, the halls being thronged at every session.

The fourth NORTHERN COUNTIES Festival was held at Inverness, and occupied three full days. The promoters were rewarded with an increased number of entries, an improved standard of performance, and a greater public interest. Instrumental entries were particularly strong in number and quality. The most outstanding individual performance was that of the Inverness Ladies' Choir (Miss Gordon conductor), which one of the adjudicators, Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill, described as on its way to being the most remarkable body of its kind in the kingdom. This choir travelled to Glasgow to compete in the Premier Class for women's choirs at the Glasgow Festival, but failed to maintain its form of the two previous years, having to be content with third place out of six competitors. The adjudicators described these singers' performance as much too hectic and restless.

FESTIVALS IN IRELAND

The twenty-ninth annual FEIS CEOIL took place at Dublin during the week May 4-9, and was quite up to the standard of the past few years. Large audiences assembled, but, alas! the need of a large central hall was more than ever apparent, and the competitions had to be held in three separate buildings. Much excitement prevailed over the Plunket Greene Cup for interpretation, with sixty-eight entries, and Prof. Granville Bantock awarded the prize to Mr. T. Gill Wallis, with Mr. W. F. Watt a close runner-up. Miss Nan McCarron won the contralto solo gold medal, her musical sense being praised by Miss Denne Parker. There was only one entry for senior harp, Miss Pauline Foley, who was recommended for third prize. The viola and junior 'cello solos were won by ladies, the former by Miss Bernice Tarrant and the latter by Miss Sheila Deeny. Out of fifty-eight entries for mezzo-soprano, Miss Kathleen Malone obtained first prize. Prof. Bantock said he paid no heed to the sight-test, and 'did not see the use of asking the singers after they sang well to remain on the platform to show they were unable to sing at sight.' The Gervase Elwes cup (fourteen entrants) was won by Miss Renee Flynne, and the O'Mara cup (three competitors) was awarded to Mr. J. L. Woods. Forty-two entered for soprano solo, which was won by Miss Dorothy McClure. Miss McClure was highly praised by Prof. Bantock, who recommended that some of the sopranos should sing at the great English festivals, as they were about the best he had ever heard. Only one choir entered in the male-choir class, the 'Independent Choral Society,' and only one for song with Irish harp accompaniment. The Pigott Memorial Cup (advanced pianoforte playing) was awarded to Miss Dorothy Stokes. Out of eight entries, the Derry Trio carried off first prize for the Ladies' Vocal Trio. Quite regrettable was the small number of choirs that competed for the mixed choir competitions. Miss Florence Mills Forsyth won the Denis O'Sullivan medal and the prize for dramatic solo-singing, and Mr. P. J. O'Toole was awarded first place for tenor solo, out of sixteen entries. The last day of the Feis, as customary, was given over to native Irish minstrelsy, but the standard was not very high. Only five bagpipes appeared—evidence of the decline of the old Uillean (Shakespeare's 'woollen') pipes, yet the playing of the winner, Mr. Leo Rowsome, was a delightful treat, and a reminder of the days that are gone, as he is the grandson of a famous co. Wexford piper. Thoroughly enjoyable was the popular verdict on the prize-winners' concert on the concluding night.

Prof. Bantock threw two bomb-shells into the peaceful arena of melody—one, by deprecating sight-reading, and the other, by urging the audience to applaud, regardless of the long-standing rule to the contrary, to safeguard the interests of provincial singers who might have no friends to greet their efforts. It must be said, however, that Prof. Bantock's comments and adjudications were irreproachable.

SLIGO FEIS CEOIL, at which Mr. Hamilton Harty was the principal adjudicator, was a great success. The soprano solo prize was awarded to Miss Josephine Hassan (Derry), while Mr. Willie Watt, of Waterford, easily secured the tenor solo prize, and also the Sligo cup. The John Delaney memorial cup (pianoforte) was won by Miss C. O'Beirne; and the Denis O'Sullivan memorial prize by Mrs. Ennis, who also won the challenge cup for interpretation. Mrs. Penrose (Waterford) was awarded first prize for violin solo. The Lady Gore Booth Cup for 'Song and chorus to encourage fireside music,' was won by the Connacht Catch Club (100 per cent.). Mr. Harty said that 'the level of expression in Ireland was higher than in England.'

At the FATHER MATHEW FEIS (Dublin), Mr. Denis Cox won the Gore cup for Irish singing. The violin scholarship was awarded to Miss Lily Kirwan; the Fitzgerald cup to Miss Lily O'Byrne (song interpretation); and the gold medal (excelsior pianoforte) to Miss Eileen Fitzgerald. The Father Mathew trophy (open only to Feis prize-winners) was won by Miss Lily O'Byrne.

The PORTADOWN Festival (April 21-24) was a great success, the adjudicators being Dr. Bairstow and Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill. The Factory and the Textile choirs made a good display. Dr. Bairstow praised the winners of the baritone and bass competitions. Dungannon Choir (Mrs. Brown) won first prize in the large mixed-voice choir section, and that for Church choirs was awarded to St. Mark's Church Choir, Portadown (Mr. W. F. Wood).

The BALLYMENA Musical Festival opened on May 4, and continued during the week, with three daily sessions. Entries this year reached the record number of four hundred and sixty, being ninety more than last year. In all, fifty choirs entered. The adjudicators were Dr. W. G. Whittaker, Mr. E. T. Davies, and Mr. Acton Bond. Mr. Davies was delighted with the Irish folk-song competitions.

Another successful Feis was that of DUNGANNON, co. Tyrone, the fourth annual Festival (May 5-8), the adjudicator being Mr. Julius Harrison.

The DERRY Feis (April 29-May 1) attracted a goodly gathering, and the standard was fairly good. Mr. Joseph O'Mara and Col. Fritz Brase were the adjudicators.

THE FOURTH BOURNEMOUTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL

The fourth Bournemouth Municipal Musical Festival consisted of eight concerts and several performances by the Glastonbury Players, between Thursday, April 16, and Saturday, April 25, inclusive. Sir Dan Godfrey carried out his usual policy of inviting composers to conduct their own pieces, and Dr. Adrian C. Boult and Mr. Jan Hurst, the Director of Music to the City of Bath, were also at the conductor's desk.

The programmes contained no absolute novelties, unless the first performance of Boughton's 'Queen of Cornwall,' with orchestra, should go under that heading. The Winter Gardens at Bournemouth are not well suited to operatic performance, for the orchestra has to be placed on the floor-level, which inevitably upsets the tonal values. The result at Bournemouth was to bring the brass into undue prominence. There is one peculiarity in Mr. Boughton's score, and that is that while the brass is up to its full standard, there are only two horns—or, at any rate, there were only two horns at Bournemouth. Another peculiarity of Mr. Boughton's orchestration in general is his fondness for employing only one family of the orchestra at a time. How far this is the result of a desire to adapt the orchestral colour to the austere and simple nature of the subject, of course cannot be said; but the effect to ears accustomed to the highly-coloured scores of these days is curious.

The literary value of Thomas Hardy's 'Queen of Cornwall' has been the subject of considerable controversy, but there can be no doubt that it is a masterly libretto. The action moves quickly. The gradual growth of the plot—the sense of impending doom coming nearer and ever nearer, makes it as fine a subject for a musician as has ever been conceived. One of its merits is the fact that it never suggests any similarity to Wagner—not only is the story not the same, but there is all the difference in the world between Wagner's glorification of all-conquering love and Hardy's story of brutality, suspicion, and revenge. Mr. Boughton is credited with having said that he has striven to write harsh music to illustrate the tragedy. He has succeeded well in creating a type of grimness in music which fits the ruthless subject.

It is possible to speak only a few words as to each of the works which were heard for the first time at Bournemouth. The first was Max Reger's somewhat heavy-handed Variations on a slight and charming theme of Mozart

(April 16). Mr. O'Connor Morris's Violin Concerto, played by Mr. William Primrose (April 16), is also a work that is pleasant to listen to. It suggests the question whether it is wise of composers to confess beforehand that they have carefully followed an admirable model. One would perhaps have appreciated Maurice Besly's 'Portrait of a Dancer in Red' more fully had the composer told us more about his subject, but at any rate it is a well-written piece. Mozart Allan's 'Unknown Warrier' (April 17) shows considerable devotion of thought and ingenuity, but it may be suggested that he has attempted to express in a symphonic poem more than anybody but a great master could compress in the necessary limits. Mr. Harry Farjeon's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was excellently played by Mr. Anderson Tyrer (April 17). It strikes the listener at a first hearing as having in it too much brain and too little heart.

The work called 'Captions,' which was played on April 23, is amusing. It is described as five 'glimpses' of an anonymous theme—in other words, five variations of a simple theme, which are by Arthur Bliss, Herbert Bedford, Eugène Goossens, Felix White, and Gerrard Williams. Arthur Bliss is, as usual, very cheerful, Eugène Goossens brilliantly clever, and Felix White is cryptic and melancholy.

One of the most interesting concerts of the series was that on Saturday, April 18, when Mr. Plunket Greene gave a recital of Stanford's songs, with Mr. Hamilton Harty at the pianoforte. The variety of interest of the songs, some of which were unfamiliar, must have been a surprise to a good many of the listeners. Mr. Harty also conducted the first performance at Bournemouth of his own new 'Irish' Symphony, which was fully criticised when heard in London. It was pleasant to renew acquaintance with Bantock's 'Hebridean' Symphony, played on April 17, and with Stanford's symphony, 'L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso,' on April 23. The two programmes on April 16 contained Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture and Vaughan Williams's 'London' Symphony respectively. The two performances enhanced one's opinion of Sir Dan Godfrey's virtues as a conductor. Another interesting item was Mr. Harold Samuel's performance of the 'Emperor' Concerto of Beethoven, in which this artist proved that it is unfair to consider him as a mere specialist in Bach. His interpretation was throughout full of dignity and restrained power, and there was spiritual beauty in his reading of the slow movement.

It had been suggested that this would be the last Festival to be held in the Winter Gardens, and that the next one might take place in the new Pavilion, of which the foundation-stone is shortly to be laid. There is, however, no possibility of any Festival being held there before 1927. Sir Dan Godfrey is credited with the ambitious idea of producing 'The Ring' on that occasion. The architects claim that the concert hall will embody some new devices which will make it possible to use it both for concerts and operatic performances.

Music in the Provinces

ASHTEAD.—The Gloria from the Mass in B minor, one of the tests in which Ashtead Choral Society competed at the Leith Hill Festival, was repeated by the choir for the benefit of its own town on May 1. Mr. H. G. Kimberley conducted.

BATH.—The last four Symphonies to be played during the season at the Pump Room were Franck's on April 22; Beethoven's seventh on April 29; the 'Unfinished' and the 'Pathetic,' with Bach's Triple Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and flute, on May 6. A benefit concert to the conductor, Mr. Jan Hurst, was given on May 2.——At one of the last chamber concerts Kreisler's A minor Quartet was given.

BARNSTAPLE.—On April 27 the Musical Festival Choral Society gave a mixed programme that included 'A little bird in the air,' from 'King Olaf,' and the Epilogue from 'The Golden Legend.'

BEDFORD.—The Bedford Choral Society, re-organized and re-named from the Free Church Choral Union, and placed under a new conductor, Mr. A. F. Parris, chose 'Acis and Galatea' for its first concert on April 16. The choir was seventy strong, and sang well before a moderate attendance.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Competition Festival is recorded in another column.——The Misses Brenda Hales and Ethel Cobban gave a 'cello and pianoforte recital on April 23, the programme including Debussy's Sonata. ——Holst and Prokofiev figured in the programme of a pianoforte recital by Miss Dorothy Daniels a few days later.——Mr. A. J. Cotton, for many years the conductor of the Midland Musical Society (one of the Saturday evening choral organizations), has resigned that office.——A Society for producing grand opera, promoted by Mr. St. Clare Barfield, has been formed with a membership already reaching two hundred and fifty. Its inaugural meeting was held in the Council Chamber, with the Lord Mayor in the chair. A beginning is to be made with Gounod's 'Faust,' and the B.N.O.C. has promised support in the matter of scenery and costumes.——Mr. Sidney Russell's operatic class in connection with the Midland Institute School of Music presented scenes from 'The Magic Flute' and the second Act of 'The Marriage of Figaro' with remarkable precision and efficiency for singers still in the student stage. Mr. Russell directed. A white Monostatos, due to an oversight in the excitement of the occasion, was a curiosity of the performance.

BRIGHTLINGSEA.—The Musical Society made a departure on May 5 by putting Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen' on the stage at the Foresters' Hall. Both the dramatic production and the musical performance were successfully carried out by Mr. Leslie Everett and Mr. Dawson Hands respectively.

BURNESIDE.—The Choral Society, winners of last year's Kendal Festival, gave a concert on April 25 under Mr. A. H. Willinck. The programme included Byrd's 'O praise the Lord,' Dr. Somervell's 'The winter it is past,' Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' and 'Sumer is icumen in.'

CANTERBURY.—A concert of Old English music was given at the Chapter House in April. Mr. Fred Adlington conducted a small string orchestra of lady players, for whom he had arranged a number of keyboard pieces by Byrd, Morley, Farnaby, Purcell, Boyce, Arne, and others.

CHESTERFIELD.—On April 20, the Chesterfield Orchestral Society gave its twenty-ninth annual concert under the direction of Dr. J. F. Staton. The orchestra, composed principally of amateurs, played Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations and Beethoven's seventh Symphony.——Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony was the chief work played by the Derbyshire Symphony Orchestra on the following Sunday, when Mr. S. C. J. Hibbert conducted in the absence of Dr. Staton.

CHICHESTER.—The concerts given on the afternoon and evening of May 7 by the Chichester Musical Society were the first since the death of Dr. F. J. Read, and Sullivan's 'Brother, thou art gone before us' was sung in his memory. The principal work in the programme was 'A Tale of Old Japan.'

DAWLISH.—'A Tale of Old Japan,' sung by the Dawlish Choral Society on April 22, was the first work of serious pretensions undertaken by the Society. The performance, under Mr. H. J. Holman, was very successful.

EMSWORTH.—The Musical Society chose 'Hiawatha's Departure,' which is seldom heard apart from the complete 'Hiawatha' cycle, for its concert on April 22. Both choir and orchestra did good work under Mr. Alfred Agate.

HARROGATE.—The musical season of the Municipal Orchestra, under Mr. Basil Cameron, is in full swing. At the first symphony concert the 'Unfinished' was played, and Mr. B. Partridge was soloist in Cowen's 'Concertstück' in B minor.

HITCHIN.—A new Hitchin Choral Society has been founded, with Mr. W. E. Shepherd as conductor. Hitchin already has an Oratorio Choir.

HOVE.—To celebrate the coming-of-age of the Hove Academy of Music, Mr. A. W. Fisher organized a six days' musical festival in the first week of May. The chief event was a choral and orchestral concert at which Elgar's 'The Music-Makers' was performed. The 'Pathetic' Symphony and Schumann's Quintet were in the programmes, and the new works included an Overture and an 'Ode to the March Winds' by Mr. Fisher.

LEATHERHEAD.—On April 29, the Orpheus Choir, conducted by Mr. G. Kimberley, sang 'The Silver Swan' (Gibbons), 'Lullaby' (Byrd), 'To shorten winter's sadness' (Weelkes), and the Gloria from the B minor Mass—all Leith Hill test-pieces.

LEVENSHULME (Manchester).—A comparatively young but flourishing organisation, the Levenshulme United Choral Society, gave a successful concert in Levenshulme Town Hall, on March 25, under the conductorship of Mr. Ernest Cookson. The most ambitious efforts of the choir were 'On Himalay,' by Bantock, and the eight-part Motet, 'The surrender of the soul to the Everlasting Love,' by Cornelius.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. Herbert Howells gave a recital of his compositions on April 18 with the help of a string quartet which played his 'Lady Audley's' Suite.——A long programme of glees, part-songs, quartets, and solos was given by the Glee and Madrigal Society on May 7, and a large contingent of school-children came to listen.——Otherwise recent music at Newcastle has been left to the Carl Rosa Opera Company.

OXFORD.—Mr. Maurice Besly's orchestral concert on Sunday, May 3, was preceded by an 'appreciation' rehearsal for children on the Saturday morning. The music included the 'Unfinished' Symphony and Mr. Besly's own arrangement of the 'Londonderry Air.'

PORTSMOUTH.—The Portsmouth North End Choral Society brought a successful season to an end on April 29 with a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' to a large and appreciative audience. Mr. Ernest Birch conducted, and the soloists were Miss Norah Scott-Turner, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Keith Falkner.

READING.—At the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season, Dr. E. O. Daughtry conducted Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony, a Gavotte and Musette by Bach, and various other well-known works, the programme being varied by Mr. Eric Godley's singing.

RIPON.—The Musical Society brought the Leeds Symphony Orchestra to Ripon on April 24 for a concert under Dr. C. H. Moody's direction. A programme of familiar works included the 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mozart's G minor, and a 'Wand of Youth' Suite. The event was described as the best orchestral concert heard at Ripon for some time.

SHEERNESS.—The audiences at the Choral Union's concerts on April 30 and May 1 had an opportunity to appreciate both the words and the music of 'A Tale of Old Japan.' The poem of Alfred Noyes was recited by Mr. H. W. Bryceson before the choir and orchestra gave Coleridge-Taylor's setting. Mr. S. Quint conducted.

SIDMOUTH.—The sixty-fourth annual concert of the Choral and Orchestral Society was given on April 21. Mr. J. A. Bellamy conducted, and the programme included Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.'

SOUTHAMPTON.—'A Tale of Old Japan,' the 'Tannhäuser' Overture, the 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and 'Blest Pair of Sirens' were performed by the Philharmonic Society on April 22, under Prof. George Leake. The house was full, and the concert was a great success.

STALYBRIDGE.—The Harmonic Society, established in 1844, is recovering from a recent period of depression, and had a large audience for its concert on April 28. An excellent selection of part-songs by Elgar, West, Faning, and Pinsuti was sung under the direction of Mr. Norman Andrew.

STROUD.—By omission we did injustice in our last issue to an excellent concert given by the Stroud Choral Society two months ago. Mr. S. W. Underwood conducted satisfying performances of Bach's 'Sleepers, wake,' two of Holst's 'Hymns from the Rig Veda,' and part of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas.' Miss Joan Elwes sang the music of Dido.

TENTERDEN.—Miss Margaret Balfour sang at the concert held by the Music Club on April 29. Part-songs and madrigals were sung by a small choir, and the Kent String Quartet played Mozart and Rheinberger.

TONBRIDGE.—For its concert on April 27 the Tonbridge Choral Society gave place to the Oriana Singers, and benefited by a typical programme under the direction of Mr. C. Kennedy Scott. The scheme comprised twenty-two items, from 'Sumer is icumen in' to Holst's 'Swansea Town.'

TORQUAY.—Mr. Albert Sammons played the Beethoven Violin Concerto at the Pavilion on April 23.——'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' was performed by the Philharmonic Society on April 21, under the direction of Dr. Harold Rhodes. The programme also included six part-songs, and Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in A minor.

TORRINGTON.—A small string orchestra and a pianoforte supported the choir of the Torrington Choral Society in 'The Death of Minnehaha' on May 6, Mr. F. J. Webber conducting.

YARMOUTH.—A sacred cantata, 'Laus Deo,' by Dr. Haydon Hare, was sung by the Musical Society under his direction on April 23.

Music in Scotland

Very little concert work falls to be reported this month. When April comes in, concerts give place to competitive musical festivals in Scotland.

At Glasgow, M. Marcel Dupré, the famous organist of Notre Dame, Paris, gave a recital, in which the item of outstanding interest was his own 'Passion' Symphony in four parts—'The world awaiting the Saviour,' 'Nativity,' 'Crucifixion,' and 'Resurrection,' laid out on modern lines. The Westbourne Choir, conducted by Mr. A. M. Henderson, gave variety by singing movements from Henschel's 'Mass' and examples of Russian music, which they have now made familiar to Glasgow audiences. The Westbourne Choir's répertoire is by way of becoming rather stereotyped.

Prof. D. F. Tovey, now happily recovered from serious illness, delivered the third series of ten Cramb Foundation lectures at Glasgow University. The lectures were less popular in manner and matter than those of the previous lecturers, Dr. Percy Buck and Sir Walford Davies, and attracted smaller audiences, but their originality of thought and whimsical provocativeness, and the charm and lucidity of Prof. Tovey's illustrations at the pianoforte, gave great enjoyment.

At the first general meeting of the honorary members of the Edinburgh Reid Symphony Orchestra, which was re-organized on a co-operative basis at the beginning of the past season, Lord Murray reported on the work and finances of the Orchestra. Musically it continues to progress under the direction of Prof. Tovey, and financially the call on the guarantors was less than in previous years, but much remains to be done before the Orchestra can be said to be safely founded.

The Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society has appointed Mr. Ralph T. Langdon as conductor in succession to Mr. Paul de la Torre, resigned. Mr. Langdon graduated at Edinburgh University, and gained the Bucher Scholarship, thereafter studying as Bucher Scholar under Prof. Röntgen, at Amsterdam Conservatoire, and Prof. Max Pauer, at Stuttgart Conservatoire.

The Edinburgh Amateur Opera Company (Mr. De La Haye) in the course of a six nights' run, produced successfully Gluck's 'Orpheus,' Leoncavallo's 'Pagliacci,' and Auber's 'Masaniello,' the last-named not having been heard at Edinburgh for a generation.

Dunfermline Choral Union (Mr. A. M. Henderson), accompanied by members of the Dunfermline Amateur Orchestra, sang Hamish MacCunn's 'Bonnie Kilmeny,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' Elgar's Suite from 'The Bavarian Highlands,' and the 'Coronation Scene' from Moussorgsky's 'Boris.' The junior branch of the Dunfermline Amateur Orchestral Society (Mr. J. M. Marshall) gave a concert of miscellaneous pieces.

A musical experiment is being made by the Carnegie Dunfermline Trustees, who are inviting the local musical societies to supply a week's music in June, in Pittencrieff Park. Among the societies taking part are the Dunfermline Choral Union and the Dunfermline Amateur Orchestra, and the week will close with a community-singing concert, led by Mr. David Stephen, Carnegie Trust Director of Music.

Largs Choral Union (Mr. W. N. Macquarrie) sang Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' and miscellaneous pieces.

A year ago Stonehaven Choral Union died after a lingering illness, the certified cause of death being 'lack of male singers.' The blank in the town's musical life has now been made good by the formation of a female-voice choir, the Brandon Choir, which gave a successful first concert, under the leadership of Miss J. F. Templeton.

At Alva, the Hillfoots Choral Society (Dr. Barnes) sang Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' Gade's 'Spring Message,' and madrigals and part-songs.

Castle Douglas Choral Society (Mr. A. E. Whiteley) sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Departure' and miscellaneous part-songs.

Larkhall Choral Union and Lanark Select Choir combined forces in a miscellaneous programme of choral pieces.

Lanark Amateur Orchestral Society (Mr. W. T. Prentice), a recent outcome of the Festival movement in Upper Lanarkshire, made a first appearance in a programme of which the chief item was a Haydn Symphony. SEBASTIAN.

Music in Ireland

BELFAST.—A novel and delightful performance took place in Ulster Hall on April 18, when an orchestral concert organized by the British Broadcasting Company was given in aid of the Orchestral Players' Benevolent Fund. As a finale Mr. Godfrey Brown directed a fine reading of 'Land of Hope and Glory' and of the 'Hallelujah' Chorus, by way of community singing, the audience joining heartily in the singing.

DUBLIN.—Mr. H. F. Ellingford gave an enjoyable organ recital on April 17, at St. George's Church, under the auspices of the Leinster Society of Organists.——The Civic Guards Band, under Supt. Delaney, gave a delightful concert at the Depôt, Phœnix Park, on April 19, vocal items being contributed by Miss Agnes O'Kelly and Mr. David Legge.——As usual, the Press Fund Concert at the Theatre Royal, on April 26, was a brilliant success, quite a monster programme being presented, including very old vocal favourites and the Civic Guards Band.——'Tom Jones'—Edward German's pretty comic-opera—was produced at the Gaiety Theatre by the Rathmines and Rathgar Musical Society during the week April 27-May 2, and was admirably given by chorus, orchestra, and principals. ——Dublin citizens enjoyed thoroughly the splendid performance by the Army No. 1 Band on May 3, in the historic Phœnix Park. Strange to say, Belfast still opposes the introduction of bands on Sundays in the public parks at Bellone and Hazlewood, but it is likely that a plebiscite will be taken.——During the week May 11-16 the d'Oyly Carte Opera Company gave admirable performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's works. The season continues till May 30.——Col. Fritz Brase and his Army Band No. 1 gave a delightful programme at La Scala Theatre on May 10, in aid of the Wounded Soldiers' Comforts Fund.

His Holiness, Pope Pius XI., in accepting a copy of Chevalier Grattan Flood's 'Early Tudor Composers' (Oxford University Press) has been pleased to present the author, at Enniscorthy, with a special Jubilee Medal of the Anno Santo.

SCHREKER'S 'DER FERNE KLANG'

There is danger in hearing the early work of a living composer after having witnessed his maturity; especially so if his maturity does not carry out what his beginnings had promised. This is the case of Franz Schreker, whose opera, 'Der ferne Klang,' a work of 1912, has been performed at the Berlin Staatsoper. Many people who have been disappointed by the later fruits of Schreker's career, consoled themselves with this opera, which, it was pretended, contained the whole and the best Schreker. Though not wholly disappointing, the opera fell short of the expectations aroused by it. It became evident that there is a certain 'Leitmotiv' common to all Schreker's operas. This motive is sound itself—'Klang.' It is capable of many interpretations. Schreker understands it principally from the sensual side. This is to be regretted, for his musical means are not rich and original enough to develop sound from inner sources. Of course, he never omits to cover the sensuality with psychological conciliations. Music is, however, too sincere an art to allow half-truths to be said. It is the whole man who reveals himself in his music. It would be unjust to deny that Schreker possesses rich gifts, both poetic and musical. There is an undeniable identity of musical and poetic, or dramatic, meaning in his thought. So there was in Wagner's, but Wagner was an exception to the rule, and we should prefer musical gifts brought to perfection with a certain one-sidedness. Schreker's poetic pretensions proved hostile to the evolution of the composer. Now, in his full maturity, we see that his musical resources are completely exhausted, and his fate is scarcely doubtful.

To appreciate 'The Distant Sound,' we have to place ourselves where Schreker started. Here we can detect that his poetic but nebulous idea appeared more mysterious and original than it really was. It is very easy to see that the mixed sound in which the composer delights descends very directly from romanticism, we even remark a certain over-romanticism. The young man Fritz, who is striving after his ideal as represented by sound, may be Schreker himself, a man in whom nebulous feelings are the most characteristic feature. Viewing the opera as pure music we find traces of Wagner as well as a certain fear of clarity and simplicity. Both elements are damaging to his art. The second Act of the opera is transferred into the erotic atmosphere for which Franz Schreker has a marked predilection, the so-called Casa di Maschere, which is nothing else than a place of amusement near Venice, as imagined by the poet. But it is characteristic of Schreker that he never contents himself with representing love as it is, and the logical effect is that neither eros nor mystery are sufficiently expressed by his music. He risks very much and too little. Very seldom he decides to be simple. There is an interlude between a realistic scene of the third Act and the romantic Finale in which the artist Fritz, after having pursued the woman who loved him through all sorts of adventures, finds her again, but dies in her arms. Here we are struck by some really beautiful moments. But on the whole the musical expression conveys monotony.

Maria Schreker, the composer's wife, played the principal part. This was fortunate for the composer, for Frau Schreker is so truly inspired by her husband's work that no better interpreter could have been found for the part. She invests all the phases of her adventurous existence with an unravelled beauty, covering all that is demi-mondain with a mantle of poetic mystery, so that at the end of the opera she appears as the true heroine. Richard Tauber, a good tenor, was equal to his task. Erich Kleiber conducted the work with that full penetration of the score and perfection of sonority which have made him one of the outstanding personalities among German Kapellmeisters. The stage management was disappointing artistically, but it may have satisfied the composer himself, who, for all his talent, reveals only a bourgeois taste.

CRITICAL STATE OF THE OPERA IN GENERAL

In the official world of Berlin, discussions about the opera never come to a standstill. And no wonder, for Berlin has long been maintaining four opera houses. Besides the State opera, to which 'Die Oper am Königsplatz' was affiliated as a so-called Volksoper, there are the Deutsches Opernhaus at Charlottenburg and the Grosse Volksoper in the same part of the town. How are so many opera houses to find a public? Indeed, the observer of musical life at Berlin has to remark a never-ceasing crisis. The public hungry for opera is more numerous at Berlin than in other places, but that does not mean that its appetite has no limits. Though the period of inflation is over, the mentality resulting from it has not yet disappeared. Prices are everywhere very high. The economic situation, on the other hand, is not so rosy as it would seem at first sight. All the theatres do badly. There are some honourable and successful directors, who, tired of spending money for nothing, prefer to retire from the business and to wait for the moment when circumstances will allow them again to take it up. As regards opera, the situation is still more critical because of the much larger expenses incidental to it. The most natural procedure would be to cancel, say, two of the opera houses, and thus concentrate the public upon the rest. But this is much more difficult than it appears to be. So the opera houses remain, but the public cannot pay the prices.

At the moment one observes an ever-growing appetite of the State for opera houses. This agrees with the socialistic tendencies that dominate artistic circles, but would scarcely prove advantageous to musical life, the furthering of which is best warranted by full liberty of competition. A State monopoly would be a serious obstacle in the path of opera. This is just what we now fear, but the danger is diminished by the Municipality of Berlin taking the private opera houses into its administration. This is considered the best means of putting off the inevitable catastrophe. Thus the two private opera houses will be, it is hoped, fused under the direction of Bruno Walter. During the last ten years Walter brought the Munich Opera to a height never before reached, and he enjoys everybody's confidence. If we add also that at the Staatsoper there are different artistic currents, the critical state of operatic life at Berlin is sufficiently explained, leaving aside the expansion of wireless, which presents another crux.

AMERICAN SINGERS AT BERLIN

America has sent us a great number of remarkable singers, who do much credit to their country, for they prove the excellence of American teaching.

First of all, Benjamino Gigli, of the Metropolitan Opera House, has come again, scoring unheard of triumphs which are still in progress. His fine, fresh, tenor voice, which has grown in force since last year, helps to colour the performances of Italian opera at the Staatsoper. Less successful was Titta Ruffo. The former qualities of his once beautiful baritone voice are still preserved only by gramophone records. He made a mistake in appearing on the concert platform. As an operatic singer, playing the part of Rigoletto at the Volksoper, he displayed expressive force, but at the price of a dispute with his conductor, whom he reproached with not giving him the right tempi.

Two ladies, Anna Case and Dusolina Giannini, continued the series of American singers. The former makes us enjoy all that is furnished both by natural virtues of voice and careful study. But compared with Dusolina Giannini, she is a pleasant, though rather artificial product of culture. The latter may be considered as one of the most gifted among living singers. Her soprano voice, of decidedly southern character, has a splendour that is particularly striking in the high registers, to which she mounts without the least fatigue, and there is no less charm in her middle register. Her singing always reflects deep emotion. This young artist has a great future.

ADOLF WEISSMANN.

NEW YORK

When Mr. Gatti announced 'Rheingold' and 'Götterdämmerung' among his novelties and revivals for the winter season, assuring the complete restoration of the 'Ring,' it is safe to say that a large majority of the music-loving public considered the production of the full tale of the Rhine Maidens and their precious gold to be the climax of the scheme at the Metropolitan. Necessarily the required rehearsals deferred the appearance of this important revival. When, again, it was announced that 'Pelléas et Mélisande' was to follow the 'Ring' as the last novelty of the consecutive twenty-four weeks of opera, it is also safe to say that only a minority of the music-loving public had any expectation or hope of the success it proved to be. Produced at Paris in 1902, Debussy's masterpiece was not enough of a success to make any sensation. Revived at La Scala, by Mr. Gatti, in 1907, it was at first received with hostility, and even after repeated performances was only mildly successful, though given under the baton of the famous Arturo Toscanini. The following year Mr. Gatti came to New York, but he could not have ventured to mount 'Pelléas,' if he had wished to do so, as Oscar Hammerstein had already secured the rights to present it at the Manhattan Opera House, the institution that was for a few years the rival of the Metropolitan. Twenty years ago Debussy was no more a favourite with the public in general than Stravinsky and other moderns are to-day. He was considered discordant, unmelodic, monotonous, bewildering, and altogether offensive to musical ears. It was not to hear Debussy that crowds flocked to the Manhattan to view and listen to the new opera. It was simply to see and to hear Mary Garden, who has always been the most distinguished impersonator of Mélisande. It mattered not that the music was a bore, that the scenery was negligible, and that nobody took any interest in a quite good Pelléas and so important a Golaud as Hector Dufranne. Mary Garden was the whole thing, even as in Shakespearean plays in days gone by one star has been known to fill a house night after night, with a cast that had hardly a redeeming feature. But times have changed. Debussy is no longer an ultra-modern, a disciple of discords and queer sounds. Our ears are attuned to these, and the French composer has become a classic. To the astonishment as well as to the satisfaction of real music-lovers, the public flocked in crowds to the Metropolitan, attracted by the extraordinary poetic charm of Debussy's music, and to see the representation of his wonderful opera—an opera that stands alone and has no rival as a portrayal of human passions. Mr. Gatti seems to have done well to delay this production until the public was ready to receive it as it deserves to be received. There were many difficulties. The dreamy opera with its continued subdued tone is more suitable for a smaller house, but Hasselmans, who has conducted it many times at Paris and elsewhere, kept the voices and the orchestra in subjection, and the prevalent pianos and pianissimos were heard as perfectly as they would have been in a house half the size of the Metropolitan. A smaller raised stage was also imposed on the huge permanent platform (as in 'Così fan tutte') to aid in producing the necessary intimate effect. There were twelve scenes in the five Acts, and although Joseph Urban had already painted scenes for Pelléas, he outdid himself this time in making them both beautiful and appropriate to the poetic character of the opera. As the music is often continuous during the changes of scene, a rubber flooring was laid on the inner stage, so that even in the most pianissimo passages not a sound of the moving scenery penetrated through the golden curtains.

Great praise was also due to Mr. von Wymetal for the staging. He could not make it too realistic, nor too ideal, and he seemed to preserve a happy medium while retaining the true Maeterlinck tradition. If reference to the cast has been left to the last, it is only to emphasise its supreme importance. Lucrezia Bori made no attempt to copy the Mélisande of Mary Garden. Her voice and figure are far better suited to the part than those of her famous predecessor, while her conception of the character was entirely her own—a gentle, timid, shrinking, and pathetic Mélisande, the pathos of the death scene being incomparably represented in both voice and action. Edward Johnson, the Canadian tenor, with his wonderful intelligence, his beautiful voice, and his perfect art, played and sang his part with the suppressed passion it called for, presenting it in a manner unrivalled in the memory of our opera-goers. Clarence Whitehill, whose diction in any language he uses is so remarkable, sang and acted Golaud in his usual superb artistic manner. To many he was the star of the cast, as his passion in the scene with Mélisande, and his remorse at the end, gave him opportunities for the display of his powers that the scheme of the opera did not allow to the others. Leon Rothier, singing Arkel in his native tongue, gave a dignity to the personality of the old King that stamped it as a great representation of that character. No one who ever heard it can forget his 'If I were God, how I would pity the hearts of men.' The unity of the whole production of 'Pelléas et Mélisande' at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1925, makes the verdict unanimous among those who have seen performances of 'Pelléas' elsewhere, that this was unmatched in its perfection.

The unprecedented success of the closing operas of the season was duplicated in one of the late concerts, given to commemorate the eightieth birthday of Leopold Auer, the most celebrated living teacher of the violin. The concert was arranged by M. Auer's two most famous pupils, Jascha Heifetz and Efrem Zimbalist, but famous pianists begged the privilege of showing their appreciation of the master's position as a musician and incomparable teacher, and the names of Josef Hofmann, Serge Rachmaninov, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch were added to the list of performers. Carnegie Hall was sold out at ten dollars a ticket, and a thousand people were turned away. The testimonial to the still vigorous Leopold Auer amounted to about twenty-five thousand dollars.

PARIS

On May 1 the Opéra produced a new work, 'Esther, Princess of Israel,' composed by M. Antoine Mariotte to a poem by MM. André Dumas and Sébastien-Charles Leconte. The composer, a former marine officer, had first called public attention to himself by a lyrical drama, 'Salomé,' performed with considerable success in France and abroad. Having used for his opera Oscar Wilde's tragedy, M. Mariotte came into conflict with Richard Strauss, who also had set this text to music. A cause ensued which at the time kept critics busy. The French musician finally won the right of having his music performed in all countries. Before being made into an opera, 'Esther' had already been produced at the Théâtre Odéon, when the latter was managed by Antoine. With Mariotte's musical commentary the work gives a cruder impression of the biblical story. The authors of the libretto thought that Racine, in his tragedy, had rather betrayed the real character of Esther, as it is described in the Old Testament. Critics are at odds as to the validity of this contention. That Esther used her irresistible charm over Ahasuerus, King of the Medes, to secure for the oppressed Hebrews a chance for striking revenge, is beyond doubt. It would seem, however, that no forcible argument can be adduced to show that she was essentially cruel and bloodthirsty. Notwithstanding this controversy, Esther's story as told by the librettists afforded Mariotte a good opportunity to compose music revealing the traditional resources of operatic style. He proceeds according to the d'Indy, Fauré, Paul Dukas tradition, and his main asset seems to be a warm lyricism set forth in well worked out development. A closer precision in expressiveness and a more transparent scoring would prove advantageous to the work.

'Pelléas and Mélisande' is in the programme at the Opéra-Comique, with D. E. Inghelbrecht as conductor. Large attendances prove definitely that Debussy's music can no longer be considered only a delicate morsel for the refined and the idle.

Hardly seven years after the death of Debussy we have to note, with deep regret, the passing of André Caplet. Born in 1878, at Le Havre, Caplet had entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1896, and he won the first Grand Prix of Rome in 1901. Both as conductor and composer, Caplet did much to establish the Debussy tradition. He was virtually the first to reveal to the public 'The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian,' Debussy's last score, to a French text by Gabriele d'Annunzio. Caplet was engaged as conductor by the Boston Opera, where he produced 'The Mastersingers,' Louis Aubert's 'La Forêt Bleue,' and 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' Hardly four years after the war, Caplet presented, with the Pasdeloup Orchestra, Schönberg's 'Five Pieces for Orchestra,' a performance which took place in the midst of tempestuous demonstrations. Among the composer's output may be mentioned: 'Salambo,' a symphonic poem; 'Epiphanie,' for violoncello and orchestra; chamber music, comprising a quintet and a septet; and choral compositions such as 'The Mirror of Jesus.'

By way of first performances, we have heard, at the Société Nationale de Musique, a Quintet by Vincent d'Indy, which combines some of the best qualities of his art. The composer, who was present, was warmly cheered. Among the numerous items that figured in the programme of the concerts organized by the Revue Musicale, under the direction of M. Henry Prunières, should be mentioned a Septet by Arthur Hoerée, a young Belgian musician. It is written for four strings, flute, pianoforte, and soprano voice. In its four movements the hearer was able to appreciate the remarkable rhythmic and melodic qualities of the composer, and the humour and brilliance of his scoring. Mlle. Régine de Lormoy's pure singing and perfect delivery did much towards securing due success for this work. Two Sonatas for 'cello and flute, by your correspondent, received their first performances by the Philharmonic and the Independent Music Society respectively.

TORONTO

The Easter season here acts towards music as the uncorking of a bottle does to wine—the eager liquid rushes recklessly to freedom. Between the end of Lent and the beginning of summer there is a noticeable crowding of events of all descriptions, as if entrepreneurs and others must catch the public quickly, before the long, warm evenings draw to the out-of-doors. Passion Week saw four impressive services——two of the Bach 'St. Matthew' Passion, under Dr. H. A. Fricker, at the Metropolitan, and Dr. Ernest MacMillan, at the Eaton Memorial, and two of Dr. Albert Ham's 'The Solitudes of the Passion' Cantata, given by the combined choirs of St. James's Cathedral and Holy Trinity alternately in the two churches, the composer being at the organ.

Just now it is 'on with the dance.' Salvi, the harpist, who seems to be so much more than a mere harpist, enjoyed one of his unique evenings with a large audience: Chaliapin overwhelmed an almost crowded house with his tremendous personal magnetism (his voice unhappily being dwarfed by a cold); Paul Whiteman and his orchestra poured their spirit of tingling buffoonery into over six thousand tired minds; and 'Rose Marie,' the bright and clever musical comedy which depicts the pride of Canada, our Royal North-West Mounted Police, carried the city by storm. So much for our visitors.

The New Symphony Orchestra gave us Beethoven after its own heart, the joyous eighth Symphony, at the thirty-sixth Twilight concert, and in contrast followed with the 'Lohengrin' Cathedral Procession and Chabrier's seductive 'España' Rhapsody. Nina Gale, the assisting artist, who has, I believe, been heard in England, sang Verdi's 'Pace mio dio.' The Easter Festival of the Lilies, in which over six hundred children annually take part, gave striking proof of the soundness of Mr. Duncan McKenzie's methods in the schools. Not only have these youngsters caught a true sense of rhythm, but they now produce real tone—a miracle indeed. Holst's 'Song of the Shoemakers' and the rollicking sea chanty, 'Johnny, come to Hilo' were finely sung.

Boris Hambourg held the first of his unique series of five historical 'cello recitals, the programme being devoted to the early Italian masters—Gabrielli, Marcello, Porpora, Galeotti, Dall' Abaco, Tartini, Lanzetti, and Boccherini. Alberto Guerrero, one of our leading teacher-pianists, Nellye Gill, vocalist, and Hubert Martindale, a prominent singing teacher, have all given successful recitals. Mr. von Kunits, despite a heavy season, has managed to bring the Toronto Conservatory Orchestra up to a very worthy standard. At the annual concert, the Haydn D major Symphony, the Larghetto from the Beethoven No. 2, and the Allegro from Mozart's 'Jupiter,' received conscientious treatment.

One work, new to us, has been welcome, viz., the Chausson D major Violin Concerto, played by Miss Edythe Palmer, a talented pupil of M. Ferdinand Fillion, with string quartet and pianoforte accompaniment. Chamber works of Handel, Vivaldi, Raff, and Gabrielli, were also performed by Mr. Fillion's pupils, with evidence of exceptional artistry.

Two clubs, the Home Musical (Mrs. G. D. Atkinson, president) and the Watkin Mills Studio, held successful meetings, the former devoting its energies to the songs of Strauss, Reger, Kahn, and Vaughan Williams ('Mystical Song Cycle'), the latter concentrating on Scandinavian and Russian composers.

A new non-commercial broadcasting station, to be known as CKCL, will shortly be on the air, under the direction of Mr. A. P. Howells (ex-music master of Margate College) and the writer of these lines. Four English singers of eminence will be heard in the opening programme—Miss Marjorie Vincent, recently of the Royal College of Music, Madame Ethel Holland, of Bolton, Lancs, a contralto of considerable fame in England, Mr. Alfred Heather, who needs no introduction to the Old Country, and Mr. Watkin Mills, one of the leading English bassos of his day. It is hoped to continue this high standard of performance.

VIENNA

OPERATIC EVENTS

The Staatsoper has embarked on hard and productive work since Franz Schalk has taken sole charge of its affairs. There have been three premières during a few weeks, and at least two of these claim serious attention. The venue is once more the beautiful old Redoutensall of the ex-Imperial palace, and here Stravinsky's ballet, 'Pulcinella,' was produced under the baton of Schalk, with stage and scene directed by Heinrich Kröller. The performance was cleverly devised in an 'impromptu' spirit of witty grotesquerie. The actors carried the purposely primitive scenery on to the stage in full view of the audience. All around were the splendours of the celebrated old hall, which, with its costly tapestries, huge mirrors, and 'stylized' stage, made the visitor feel himself not a spectator in a theatre, but a guest at one of the historically famous Court functions which Mozart once conducted in the same surroundings before Austrian royalty and aristocracy.

'Pulcinella' was soon followed by the new opera of Walter Braunfels, entitled, like the old Spanish original of its book, 'Don Gil of the Green Trousers.' The libretto—written by the composer himself—freely elaborates on Tirso de Molina's famous comedy, and represents a frank attempt at the revival of that lost species of German music, the 'Komische-Oper.' In his music, too, Braunfels palpably goes back to the two famous examples of romantic German comic-opera, viz., Goetz's 'The Taming of the Shrew' and Cornelius's 'The Barber of Bagdad.' His score at all times bears witness to his musical taste and artistic refinement, and to the complete mastery of his craft both in stage technique and in orchestration. But one would now and then wish for a lighter touch, for less Teutonic thoroughness, and more swiftness of action and music. In saying that Braunfels is at his best in those passages of his score which dwell upon the deeply human sentiments of his dramatis personæ, the weakness of what aspires to be a comic-opera is at once disclosed, viz., the lack of really witty and fluent music suited to the character of the comedy. The lyrical utterances of the opera are, however, beautiful and impressive, if not at all times new and original. The performance, with Lotte Lehmann, Maria Raidl, and Richard Mayr in the leading rôles, and with Franz Schalk at the conductor's desk, did full justice to the opera, although performers, and Schalk himself, seemed to dwell more upon the lyrical than on the humorous side of the work.

The past weeks have finally brought the solution also of the difficult problem attending the maintenance of the Volksoper, and, be it said, in deplorable fashion, that much-tried house having finally given up the struggle against financial difficulties and public apathy. It will most likely remain closed for an indefinite period. The long-expected collapse of the Volksoper was brought about less through the continued financial crisis of the theatre than through the resistance of the orchestral members to the reconstruction idea offered by the backers and patrons of the scheme. Prior to its definite closing the theatre brought out a notable revival of Massenet's venerable 'Werther,' under that remarkable young conductor, Heinrich Jalowetz; and a revival of 'Madame Butterfly,' in which Ganna Walska, the Polish-American soprano, atoned for vocal indisposition by a thrilling and original delineation of the unhappy Geisha.

RETURN OF TWO FAMOUS CONDUCTORS

The return of both Felix Weingartner and Wilhelm Furtwängler to their Vienna posts, after prolonged absences, offered an opportunity for comparative valuation of these two vastly differing personalities. Furtwängler who, although a German by birth, owes his 'discovery' to the public of Vienna, appeared as leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Bruckner's ninth Symphony, and as conductor of Bach's 'St. John' Passion. His reading of Bach's work was reverential and inspired; his Bruckner, however, was less to the taste of Austrian audiences, who cherish a Bruckner tradition established by Schalk and the late Ferdinand Löwe. Furtwängler's Bruckner was stern, rigid, statuesque. We are accustomed to a more typically 'Austrian' Bruckner—romantic, soft, poetic. Furtwängler betrayed his impressive personality, and his deep intellectualism, and added to the performance certain arbitrary elements of tempo and dynamics which he has come to favour in recent years. It was all dramatic and arresting—but it was not Bruckner as Vienna knows him.

Weingartner returned for the last two of the Philharmonic's subscription concerts, and it is now decided that he will remain permanent conductor of this foremost Viennese orchestra for a term of several more years, in addition to a series of guest appearances at the Staatsoper next autumn and winter. Again, as in previous years, he gave the catholic and reverential reading of Beethoven's Ninth which Vienna has admired for many years past, and which remains unrivalled as a faithful interpretation of the master's supreme will, unmarred by such obtrusively personal traits as have become the vogue with so many conductors of late. At another Philharmonic concert Weingartner offered a 'Faust' programme, comprising Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony, and three fragments from Berlioz's 'Damnation of Faust,' which have long been known among the conductor's masterpieces. It was a unique programme, and conducted in masterly fashion. Weingartner's readings of the classic masters pose no problems, but they exhaust the intentions of the composers.

ORCHESTRAL NOVELTIES

Leopold Reichwein, the deserving and erudite conductor of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, surprised the patrons of that conservative Society by producing at least two interesting and unusual novelties, viz., Heinrich Kaminsky's 'Concerto grosso' and Ernst Krenek's Pianoforte Concerto. Kaminsky's piece is a colossal work of big structure, and a monument of fervent adherence to the lofty ideals of Johann Sebastian Bach; indeed, it is quite clearly a Bach renaissance that is the aim of Kaminsky's score. If men like Stravinsky or Hindemith occasionally adopt the old classic forms from mere fancy, or for the sake of weighing the problems of a former period, Kaminsky seems to see the salvation of contemporary music in the strict adherence to the forms and principles of the classics. His 'Concerto grosso' is an ingenious and intricate fabric of counteracting polyphonic parts—so much so that clarity and transparency seemed frequently to suffer under sheer polyphonic superabundance (which, however, may partly be accounted for in the none too happy grouping of the players on the platform).

Krenek is the far more versatile mind and the more brilliant personality. His contempt for public opinion and time-honoured tradition compels respect; there is nothing dogmatic or schematic in his Pianoforte Concerto, nor in his music in general—which still is formidable, considering his youth. His invention flows freely, and, at times, indiscriminately, but always it bears the mark of tremendous vitality and freshness. The Concerto deviates from the accustomed path even in its construction. The solo instrument (unaccompanied) opens with a slow, pensive introduction, and the same theme is played, again solo, on the keyboard, at the close, abruptly following upon a dashing dance theme of Mendelssohnian romanticism and airiness which any composer more bent upon outward effect should certainly have retained for a brilliant closing Coda. Also the scoring, though balanced and well-considered, is purposely ascetic, and disdains mere effectiveness and gratefulness. Eduard Erdman, the eminent pianist to whom Krenek has dedicated his Concerto, proved an ideal interpreter.

MODERN CHAMBER MUSIC

The Viennese String Quartet, Vienna's newest and one of the city's best chamber organizations—at any rate, the only one which specializes in the production of ultra-modern music—has recently introduced a number of important novelties under the auspices of the Austrian Section of the International Society for Contemporary Music. Most interesting among these was Alfredo Casella's Concerto for four stringed instruments, which may well be termed the best music which this eminent Italian composer has ever produced. Classic Italian forms prevail throughout the work. The second movement, a Siciliana, in its lyrical beauty and lucid texture lingers in the memory as one of the finest examples of chamber music writing; and the closing Canzone as a spontaneous inspiration guided by the artistic discipline and taste of a real master. Vigorous, if as yet unsettled, is the talent of Rudolf Réti. His Quartet and a new String Trio reveal a truly barbaric force which by its elementary vigour sweeps away all mental reservations which the hearer may hold towards such an unbridled exhibition of musical temperament. By way of contrast, Egon Wellesz's String Quartet, No. 4, is the product of a musician who has mastered his craft and conserves a learned and cultured rationality even where his invention does not fully keep pace with his ideas; it is only in his more recent operatic works that Wellesz's imagination seems to have been kindled into more instinctive utterance by the dramatic possibilities of the stage. Karol Szymanowski's String Quartet (to be heard, at the hands of the Viennese String Quartet, at the Venice Festival of the I.S.C.M. in September next), in its melodious wealth and airy grace remains true to the style associated with this composer. It is full of solo-writing, and at times—especially in the second, slow movement—resembles an accompanied melody for the leader. It is finished in form, grateful in its melodies, and transparent in its harmonic structure; in short, it is a piece of noble and highly attractive music.

PAUL BECHERT.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

ANDRÉ CAPLET, at Paris, on April 22, of lung disease, consecutive to wounds and gassing, sustained in the war. He died just at the time when he was nearing his zenith, both as conductor and as composer. It is only a few years ago that he quite found himself; but since then his achievements have been high, and rich in promise of higher things to come. At first it had seemed as though he were destined to swell the ranks of the average composers whom the Paris Conservatoire turns out in countless numbers. But soon after obtaining (1901) the Prix de Rome, he boldly struck a new course, and began to assert genuine individuality. He was the only composer I can think of who benefited directly by Debussy's influence, and, more especially, proved capable of turning to good account the teachings, not of Debussy's first characteristic works, but of 'Saint-Sébastien.' It is chiefly as a writer of vocal music that he made his mark. His Septet for three female voices and four stringed instruments (1909) is the first example of a genre which has of late come into vogue. The Sonata for voice, pianoforte, and 'cello (1919) also deserves special mention. Among his songs, the 'Trois Fables' (1919), 'Le Vieux Coffret' (1914), and the 'Ballades Françaises' (1920), are very characteristic of his outlook, and truly delightful. It is perhaps in the admirable 'Miroir de Jésus' (1923) that his inspiration reaches its highest level and his technique is most individual. A recent instrumental work, 'Epiphanie,' for alto and orchestra (1924), is also remarkable for its charm and originality. As a conductor, Caplet appeared at Covent Garden many years ago. He was then a débûtant, and England has had no opportunity to realise to what heights he had risen of late. His conducting of 'Pelléas et Mélisande' and of 'Saint-Sébastien,' will be remembered as the very finest that could be imagined. A couple of years ago, I heard him conduct at Paris a concert whose programme consisted of works by Beethoven, Mozart, Debussy, and Ravel; and the memory of that event, coupled with my impressions of his recently-published works, helps me acutely to realise how great is the loss to France, and, indeed, to the musical world at large.

M.-D. C.

ALBERTO MERKLIN, organ-builder and writer on organ matters, on March 22. A member of a family of illustrious craftsmen, he was born at Freiburg, Germany, on February 2, 1892. At the age of seventeen, having finished his special studies, he made a tour of Europe, visiting the most famous organ works in Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, England, Austria, Russia, &c. Having finished his wanderings, he entered the house of Puget, at Paris, and was erecting an organ for them in the province of Burgos (Spain) when the war broke out. He remained where he was, became a naturalized Spaniard, and set up in business for himself. (Until he settled in Spain his name was Stein.) In addition to his work, he devoted much time to study and research, giving the results partly in his book, 'Organologia' (the most modern and complete work in the Spanish language dealing with the history and construction of the organ), and partly in the Leipsic review, Zeitschrift für Instrumentenbau. One of his last discoveries was a 15th-century swell-box in Andalusia, the lid of which could be raised or lowered by means of a pedal. The first of a series of articles from his pen, on the organs of Toledo Cathedral, appears in this issue of the Musical Times.

JOHN ROBERT TOMS, at Wellington, Somerset, on April 2. He was born on June 2, 1839, played the organ (minus pedals) at the age of four, and before his eighth year was official organist at Langford Badville; at the age of eight he was appointed to the parish church of his native town, where he served for fifty-two years. He was a prodigy at both ends of his long career; for at eighty-five his playing seemed as good as ever it was. Moreover, he kept abreast of things, and when well over four-score years of age was studying the pianoforte music of Debussy and John Ireland. The Musical Times of May, 1922 (p. 351), contained a tribute from Mr. H. C. Colles, who received his first lessons from Mr. Toms.

JONATHAN MACRONE, at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, on April 1, in his ninetieth year. He was born at Macclesfield, and after holding the post of organist at Berkhamsted, Cardiff (St. Mary's), Cheltenham, and Lowestoft, he became organist and choirmaster at Newtown Parish Church, a position he filled for thirty years. Twelve years ago he was appointed to Newtown Baptist Church, and did duty there until a few months before his death.

Miscellaneous

In connection with the London School of Dalcroze Eurhythmics, a Summer Vacation Course for men and women will be held at Westfield College, Kidderpore Avenue, Hampstead, from August 3 to 15. M. Jaques-Dalcroze will direct, assisted by Miss Ethel Driver and Miss Anne Driver. Particulars from the School, 23, Store Street, W.C.1.

Mr. Herbert Antcliffe, who is at present living at The Hague, has recently written a short history of 'Music in Europe since Wagner,' which is being published (in Dutch) by the Amsterdam firm 'Elsevier.' It is probable that an English edition will appear later in the year.

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

VILLAGE ORGANIST. — Sawyer's 'Extemporisation' (Novello) will help you if you work regularly and thoughtfully. The ability to improvise brief, acceptable passages and movements is not difficult to develop. But of course little can be done until the student is able to think in terms of music. And this thinking is useless if it gets no farther than chords. The player must be able to deal mentally with musical sentences, connected and contrasted, just as a speaker does with verbal sentences. A speaker whose mind could grapple only with separate words, or with a few clichés, would give his hearers a bad time. But isn't a terribly large proportion of organ extemporisation on these lines? Yet it need not be, for any player with a good knowledge of harmony could in a few weeks change his improvisation from an infliction into a pleasure. We wish some of our organist readers would try a thoughtful, systematic quarter of an hour daily for a month, and let us know the result. Saint-Saëns used to contend that just as any intelligent and educated person ought to be able to make a short impromptu speech on any ordinary every-day subject, so a musician should be ready to improvise brief movements. Neither speech nor music need be strikingly original; what is needed is rather something grammatical, in good taste, and suitable to the occasion. This is surely no unreasonable demand, and every organist should set to work to meet it.

In response to 'J. G. H.'s inquiry about a Yorkshire song called 'Leeds Old Church' (see Musical Times, May, p. 463), Mrs. Bertha King kindly sends a manuscript copy of words and music, which we will forward to our correspondent if he will kindly send his address (we have mislaid his letter). For the benefit of readers who may be interested, we pass on Mrs. King's information that a number of such Yorkshire songs are to be found in the 'Leeds University Song Book,' a collection made by Mr. T. J. Hoggett, Lecturer in Music at Leeds University. 'Leeds Old Church' is a typical dialect song, describing the adventures of a youth who takes a day off to go to Leeds Fair. We quote the verse that gives the song its title:

'Next thing I saw were Leeds Owd Church,
I'd nobbut been i' yon i' my days,
And I almost felt ashamed of mysen for I didn't know their ways.
There were twenty or thirty folks i' tubs and boxes sat,
When up there comes a saucy old chap: says he,
"Lad, take off thy hat."

(Chorus)
'With a bumpsy, bumpsy bay, Too-ra-roo-la laddiday, Bumpsy, bumpsy bay, Too-ra-roo-la laddiday.'

The song is sung to a tune that reminds us strongly of 'A fine old English gentleman.'

[Since the above was in type, we have heard from Messrs. Banks, County Arcade, Leeds, that they publish 'Leeds Old Church' (1s.)].

OPERA.—(1.) You will find dozens of songs suitable for a boy of twelve years in Novello's four volumes (1s. 6d. each) of Classical Songs, which embody well over a hundred examples. The term 'classical' has been used with elasticity, and the selection has been made entirely with a view to young singers. (2.) For every good operatic aria that is suitable for a light baritone (or any other voice) there are dozens of better songs that are not operatic. We would recommend you to keep a strict rein on your operatic ambitions. Yet if you must indulge them, here goes. But where does 'modern opera' begin? Late Verdi, say. In 'Otello' there are 'Era la notte' and the Credo, and maybe Otello's death song can be sung by a high baritone. In 'Falstaff,' 'Quand' ero paggio.' Puccini? Scarpia and Sharpless do not indulge in arias, but in the last Act of 'Bohème' one of the lower voices addresses a song to an old overcoat—'Vecchia zimarra,' we believe it is called. As to up-to-date opera, our mind is a blank. If we may carry back as far as the Hans Sachs songs in 'Die Meistersinger,' why not to 'O star of eve'? The light baritone, we fear, gets little operatic limelight. English opera—we had nearly forgotten it—gives 'Woo thou thy snowflake,' in 'Ivanhoe.'

G. E.—We don't like your inquiry! You want to know 'in what compass the bass or baritone voices should be confined for effective singing, and the highest and lowest notes it would be advisable to employ in writing for these voices.' A great deal more knowledge than this is needed by those essaying to write songs. The trouble is that many song-composers are content with it; hence the large proportion of songs that are good to look at, but bad to sing or hear. Living where you do, you have access to a good public library. Go there, and look up the compass of the voices in 'Grove,' under the various headings. But (we repeat) don't stop at that if you mean to compose a bass or baritone song. Take counsel with a singer; or, better still, have a term's lessons with a good teacher of singing. We would advise you to study the songs of the great composers but for the fact that a large number are not good models in this particular respect. Brahms, for example, too often appears to have written for an abstract, composite kind of voice, instead of for one of the ordinary classification. For first-rate examples of effective bass-baritone songs, however, you might examine Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea' and 'Songs of the Fleet.'

INQUIRER.—(1.) We found Prout's books on 'Double Counterpoint and Canon' and 'Fugue' very useful. But perhaps his 'Fugal Analysis' is best of all. (2.) The question seems to us to be clear enough. Obviously, if you are asked to add 'two imitative parts' to a given theme, the added parts should imitate the theme, the result being three-part imitative writing. (3.) To learn the art of writing pianoforte accompaniments, you should study good models. Primers on composition can do little more than touch on the subject. Get some volumes of fine songs, from the classical lieder writers to present-day British song composers. In fact, you could learn all you need for your purpose from Stanford alone. Examine any one of his collections of Irish songs or song-cycles (Boosey). Don't overlook Grieg in this connection. His songs seem to be forgotten by most singers, but many are of great beauty, and the accompaniments are of the quality to be expected from such a keyboard artist. (4.) For R.C.O. ear-tests, work at 'Two hundred and fifty Ear-Tests,' by Katharine S. Jones.

D. O.—In Wesley's 'Holsworthy Church Bells,' ought 16-ft. pedal-tone to be used in giving out the theme? We should say not. Wesley indicates that this page is to be played on the Choir, without pedals. But Wesley had bigger hands than most of us, and wrote here (as in his other organ music) some stretches that only a few players can manage. If this is the case with you, play the theme on Choir, coupled to Ped., with no pedal stops drawn, and let the feet play the few notes that you cannot reach comfortably with L.H.

PERPLEXED.—Try the 'Monologues,' 'Six Short Pieces,' 'Ten Trios,' 'Twenty-four Pieces in Fugal Style,' and 'Twelve Characteristic Pieces' of Rheinberger. Many of these will meet your requirements for good pieces of two or three minutes in length, for use during collections. Ropartz's 'Au pied de l'Autel' contains about a hundred short pieces of good quality. (It can be obtained through Novello, 8*s*.) Chesters publish a hundred pieces by Eugène Gigout, in sets of twenty-five, which we think you would find useful.

E. A. S.—Presumably the examination question demands a harmonization on the lines of first species counterpoint, as you say. But you must not make up your mind that such a method precludes a musicianly and interesting result. Some of the finest of hymns and psalm-tunes are written on this 'note against note' method. Everything depends on the choice of notes, and the way they are put 'against' one another.

E. S. E. F.—If you pronounce 'Hallelujah' with the 'j' sound you will give your fellow-singers a surprise, and there is your answer! The other spellings you mention, 'Alleluia' and 'Alleluya,' are matters of taste and of appeal to the eye. The second seems to be preferable. Anyway, all three are pronounced the same, except that in the first (which rarely occurs outside the Handel chorus) the aspirate is sounded.

F. G. G. asks for the identity of the tunes that used to be played on the clock chimes of Tickhill Church till 1807, when they were replaced by fresh ones. We regret that we have not space to quote the tunes. The first begins:

'INSECTY' (horrid nom de plume!) wants to know how to keep moths out of a pianoforte. 'Insecty' says they come from an adjacent evergreen hedge. We can suggest no remedy. Can any body? (2.) We don't know the studies mentioned, but we have every faith in the writer of them so far as educational work is concerned.

S. H. P.—We know of no music specially suitable for use at a service of Devonians and Cornishmen. Can readers suggest something (organ music, or arrangements) based on West Country tunes, or by composers born in the West Country?

C. H. R.—We know of no books that cover the ground mentioned in your four questions. You must be prepared to dig for your information. Follow the book reviews in this and other musical journals.

Mr. Leslie A. Lickfold writes suggesting that our correspondent, 'Wenge' (see Musical Times, May, p. 463) will find a useful book wherewith to supplement Lightwood's 'Hymn-Tunes and their Story,' in Athelstan Riley's 'Concerning Hymn-Tunes and Sequences' (Mowbray, 2*s*. 6*d*.). Mr. T. P. Levett also writes pointing out that the historical edition of 'Hymns A. & M.' deals with hymnology in an exhaustive introduction of over a hundred pages, with illustrations and music-type examples; and that the edition gives the history of words and music of every hymn in the book.

Can readers help a correspondent with information as to the following old musical instrument? It 'consists of a brass instrument, the bottom of which is covered with glass; on both sides there is a board about six inches high, containing pegs from which several rows of strings cross, harp-wise. This part is flat, and enclosed in a table of mahogany about 36-46 ins. long, by 20-25 ins. The whole is on four legs of about the height of an ordinary table. There is a key for tuning by means of the pegs, and two small fine bats (?) for playing it.'

The family of the late William Crowther Alwyn wish to obtain a copy of his Pianoforte Sonata, written in 1871, and published by Messrs. Lamborn Cook. It is out of print.

IMPORTANT NOTICE. The British Legion and "A World Requiem."

FIELD-MARSHAL EARL HAIG recently sent a letter to the musicians of Great Britain, from which the following is an extract: "You would be helping the cause so dear to me if you would assist to establish and maintain in your district Annual Festival Commemoration Performances in aid of my appeal for ex-service men of all ranks, their dependents, and the widows and orphans of the fallen."

Some misunderstanding has arisen about the British Legion's claim on Choral Societies, &c. Will intending performers of "A World Requiem" please therefore note the following: By the terms of the contract between Mr. John Foulds and the Publishers, the performing rights of "A World Requiem" are vested in the British Legion for a terminable period only.

From those who give a performance of the work from the Vocal or Choral Score, the British Legion has the right to claim a two-thirds share of the profits PROVIDING THAT THE LOCAL LEGION FOR WHICH SUCH PERFORMANCES ARE GIVEN ASSISTS THE GIVERS BY ADVERTISEMENT, PATRONAGE, ETC. IF THIS ASSISTANCE IS NOT FORTHCOMING, THE WORK MAY BE GIVEN INDEPENDENTLY OF THE LEGION.

AT THE BOAR'S HEAD

A MUSICAL INTERLUDE IN ONE ACT

THE LIBRETTO TAKEN FROM

SHAKESPEARE'S KING HENRY IV.

THE MUSIC, FOUNDED ON OLD ENGLISH MELODIES, BY

GUSTAV HOLST

(Op. 42).

PIANOFORTE ARRANGEMENT BY VALLY LASKER.

Vocal Score, Price Six Shillings Libretto, One Shilling

THE TIMES—April 4, 1925

". . . . The dialogue moves almost at speaking pace; the tunes appear so easily that not one in ten of them would be recognised as a quotation (Holst owns to about forty borrowed tunes) if he had not shown his hand in a printed preface. The orchestration is another point of subtle interest. It is generally inconspicuous, almost always light enough to let the voice come through without effort. It never distracts attention from the play, yet Holst's skill appears in the way he clothes the thinnest harmonic outline with apt colour."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH—April 4, 1925

". . . . The generous use Mr. Holst has made of Old English melodies garnered from the Playford, Chappell, and Cecil Sharp collections. . . . Whatever its constituents this music adds zest and momentum to the comic scenes; it rises to dignity and eloquence in the noble monologue of Prince Henry; it sets in relief every element of the last episode where the love passages of Falstaff and Doll are broken off by war alarms. . . . . The individuality of the composer emerges clear and distinct, binding together firmly the action. It is a personality compounded of great daring and great simplicity; of a modern love for sharp, slick combination of harmony and an innate bias for the song that is the people's heritage. One might almost think of Holst as a master of the Tudor period who during the eras of German hegemony in music has lain in enchanted sleep, and awakened again in the twentieth century to resume his song making with modern tools."

DAILY MAIL—April 4, 1925

". . . . This original and exquisite little score . . . . It was no foolhardiness but a sound instinct that prompted the addition of this music to the richest and wittiest comedy scenes that ever came from pen of man. Mr. Holst's music is woven on material from the Old English country dance book. The small orchestra keeps these slight and blithe tunes chattering or murmuring, and above it the words are fitted in a rare new manner. The fine ingeniousness of it all can be judged from the score."

THE MORNING POST—April 4, 1925

". . . . More than half of the problem which Mr. Holst has set himself has been the mating of a certain text with a certain body of tune without doing violence to either. He has succeeded, and now that the job has been done one sees how inevitable is his solution of a difficult problem, and with what extraordinary skill it has been accomplished. . . . . The real feat of the composer has been the apparent ease with which he has brought words and music together, and has allowed free play to the Shakespearean text, while adding a covering of music as delightful as it is pertinent. . . . . The curtain is Shakespeare's, but it is also Mr. Holst's in an admirably effective page of his score. In his new opera he shows again his sense of theatrical effect, both in the ingenuity with which he has arranged this episode, and in the use he makes of his orchestra."

DAILY NEWS—April 4, 1925

". . . . Mr. Holst's method of composition is decidedly new. He has taken over forty English folk-songs, and used them as the principal element of the score, besides tunes of his own. The folk-songs are developed, combined, and transformed with surprising ingenuity."

THE SUNDAY TIMES—April 5, 1925

". . . . The melody that Mr. Holst has invented for them [the Sonnets], beautifully free in rhythm, and remote in style yet without a suspicion of archaism, seems a natural emanation from them. His technical skill is shown in the masterly combination of this song ['Devouring Time'], later with the 'King Arthur' ballad, in a little ensemble that comes just at the right moment. One is astonished at the general congruity between Shakespeare's words and the traditional tunes."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN—April 4, 1925

". . . . 'At the Boar's Head' is a work of genius, if only for its cleverness and the masterly way in which the words of Shakespeare are made to run in with the old and strongly rhythmical melodies of Shakespeare's own time. It is a work of genius also because it answers to the geniality of Shakespeare. . . . Mr. Holst should in this work have made friends with the man in the street."

THE PERFECT FOOL

OPERA IN ONE ACT

WORDS AND MUSIC BY

GUSTAV HOLST

OP. 39

PRICE ... ... SIX SHILLINGS

Libretto One Shilling

THE BALLET FROM "THE PERFECT FOOL"

Full Score, 15s.; Pianoforte Solo, 3s.; Pianoforte Duet, 4s.

THE TIMES

The ballet music . . . is the most brilliant thing in a work glittering with brilliant moments. . . . There is one delicious musical moment, an almost Purcellian "round" for three voices. . . . and it is not an isolated moment.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH

It is a safe and a proud thing to say that in the whole history of opera no composer has produced a more perfectly fitting score and libretto than Gustav Holst has produced in this opera. . . . In very truth this is a perfect little opera, a veritable masterpiece after its kind, of wit and humour. . . . Brilliantly clever and amusing.

THE MORNING POST

The Perfect Joke would be a better title for Mr. Holst's opera. . . . Mr. Holst shows the rare and precious ability to make a musical joke that everyone can see—or hear. . . . The whole thing is something entirely fresh, and follows a well-defined line of its own. . . . Actually there is not a weak page in the score, and though story and music differ from the expected, the way they are handled with originality and power constitute the opera a little masterpiece.

THE DAILY MAIL

The Perfect Fool . . . ought to have a sweeping success if musical people can command enough sense of humour and if people of humour have ears open to the splendour of the music. . . . Splendid music, and playfully mocking, allusive, fantastic libretto. . . . And there are numbers of first-rate tunes—for Holst is a prime melodist.

DAILY NEWS

It will appeal strongly to musicians all over the world who are familiar with operatic literature.

DAILY EXPRESS

His rhythmical capacity serves him extremely well in the ballet music, which is, indeed, some of the best that has been written in opera for a long time.

REFEREE

A ballet of such originality and interest, accompanied by such masterly music, that interest was excited and admiration aroused. . . . Musically this ballet is the finest portion of the work. . . . The instrumentation is a marvel of suggestion and humour.

PALL MALL GAZETTE

Holst has provided excellent entertainment in company with some remarkably good music. The latter is rich in the two essentials of tune and rhythm. . . . There are many tunes—the Wizard's "Wooing Song," for example—which are so simple and accessible that one is unconsciously whistling them after a single hearing. . . . There are many gems. The ballet-music, of course, is fairly well known by now, but the "Round" of the three girls fetching water was a charming moment, and the unaccompanied chorus towards the end a piece of real virtuosity.

DAILY CHRONICLE

A brilliant little fantasy. . . . The ballet music is most effective, particularly the exquisite Dance of the Spirit of Water.

BIRMINGHAM POST

Highly diverting in a vein entirely its own. . . . Plain, pure, unbending Holst from beginning to end, the writing masterly in its directness, and the scoring amazingly pointed and suggestive.

WESTERN DAILY PRESS

We may reasonably hope that Mr. Holst's all too short opera will take its place permanently in that small but brilliant constellation of comic-operas on the grand scale of which The Mastersingers and The Marriage of Figaro are the bright particular stars.

MUSICAL NEWS AND HERALD

The Perfect Fool is the finest piece of real musical humour that has appeared for a long time.

THE MUSICAL STANDARD

The Perfect Fool is the best thing Holst has given us. . . . Themes of quite extraordinary beauty, arresting to the ear, and haunting the memory even after a first hearing.

SUNDAY TIMES

Indeed, he has performed a notable feat of alchemy. He has taken of the common objects of opera, grown hoary and wearisome in service, and accomplished, with enharmonic subtlety, their transmutation and combination into something new and significant.

Look at these Names

They are all names to conjure with in the sphere of modern organ music. They are the names of men who have composed some of the finest organ music extant—

And the fruits of their genius are at your disposal for 2/6 per week!

"THE ORGAN LOFT" is an absolutely unique collection of the best works of modern composers. It is a "Library" of organ music in the widest and most comprehensive sense. Within its twelve volumes there is a wondrous store of organ music fascinating in its variety, its diversity of styles, and its ever-changing appeal. There is music here to please all tastes and charm the most captious critics.

In "THE ORGAN LOFT" the choice of pieces is almost endless. To the organist who would do justice to his post by playing music of a consistently high standard "THE ORGAN LOFT" is a necessity.

In each volume there are approximately 190 pages of music, comprising 30 compositions, And They Are All Good. Whether you are a church organist, a recitalist, or a cinema organist, you will find in "THE ORGAN LOFT" music to suit all needs, no matter what the occasion may be.

Though produced at enormous cost, we have determined to bring this splendid range of organ music within the reach of all by means of the instalment system of payment given below. This is an absolutely new idea in music selling. We provide the organist to whom these great works have hitherto been unattainable with an unexampled opportunity of enjoying them, and we practically loan him the capital to enable him to do so.

By sending 10/- with order you will receive the entire set of twelve volumes, carriage paid, and you pay the balance by the following monthly instalments:

NOTE PERFECT! and Without Music.

Can you be sure of that? Or is there a doubt in your mind when you are expected to play?

It is the feeling of uncertainty of memory that spoils so many performers, and takes away the real pleasure your music ought to be to you and your listeners.

If you can play the PIANO, VIOLIN, 'CELLO, or ORGAN from music

I GUARANTEE TO TEACH YOU in my short Correspondence Course to play from memory with ease and certainty by the

MEMORY-PLAYING.

You will find this Course of the greatest value, whether you are able to play from memory now, or not.

How To Play Difficult Music With Ease.

PIANISTS who wish to play the music which affords the greatest enjoyment and relaxation—the compositions of the world's greatest musicians—and who are adverse to the drudgery of wearisome keyboard practising in order to obtain the necessary technical proficiency, will find the "BRAIN TO KEYBOARD" method of the greatest possible help.

Practice on this System, much of it away from the keyboard, is never wearisome; and after some weeks of it, spending quite a short time every day, a degree of technical proficiency is obtained which would be otherwise impossible, even after years of keyboard practising for several hours daily.

Many eminent musicians, including the late SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, have used and highly recommended my System—the ORIGINAL POSTAL SYSTEM. More than 19,000 Successful Students of all ages add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard"
Macdonald Smith's System of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "LIGHT ON PIANOFORTE PLAYING," will gladly be sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in my System. When applying, please state whether comparative beginner, average, or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.
M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQ., LONDON, W.C.1.

F. C. FIELD HYDE
(Specialist Teacher of Teachers)

will conduct his HOLIDAY COURSE in LONDON from JULY 30 to AUGUST 8, 1925.

Lecture-Demonstrations on

The Art of Voice Train ng.
The Teaching of Song Interpretation.
Problems of the Singing Class.

The opinions of hundreds of Professional Musicians previously published are conclusive proof of the value of this Course, and Mr. FIELD HYDE is prepared to GUARANTEE SATISFACTION to any teachers who are interested in the subject but have a doubt as to its benefit to themselves.

One of the most experienced vocal teachers who has attended, wrote: "I am DAILY EXPERIENCING the benefit I received from your Course."

A Cathedral Organist and Vocal Teacher said: "If the other members have reaped ONE-TENTH THE HELP I have received they are amply repaid."

For those who are preparing for the L.R.A.M. or A.R.C.M. Examinations, the Course will save terms of private lessons.

The Course will be given in Upper George Street, London.

For full particulars, write:

Solo Pianist - LILIAS MACKINNON.

"February, 1925.

"Dear Miss Mackinnon,

". . . . Lately I have put the system to a severe test, having played eleven times in the last fortnight, some of the Concerts being real ordeals. Thanks to you and your excellent and sound system, from always having been unpleasantly nervous on account of my memory, I played long Programmes with comfort and assurance.

"Your knowledge of psychology is amazing, and I should like to thank you for it, and for the very real help you must offer to so many who, like myself, are liable to be overcome by one's limitations instead of overcoming them.

"May I tell you how more than grateful I am to you.

"Yours sincerely,

"_____."

However impossible you find it to memorize now, the Mackinnon Memory Course can train your memory successfully in a few months. Only fifteen minutes' daily practice is required. Teachers and students easily fit in the Course with their other work. Age is no disadvantage, the Course has been taken with equal success by pianists of from 17 to 70!

Send coupon below for booklet giving full particulars, with numerous testimonials, to-day.

GUARANTEE.

If within four weeks from the receipt of the first lesson, and before the receipt of the second, any student feels that he or she has not made definite progress as the result of taking the Course, such student's fees will be refunded in full.

THE TECHNIQUER
FOR STRETCH, STRENGTH, AND SUPPLENESS.

CARL WEBER, the renowned teacher says:
"After a trial, I find 'The Techniquer' an admirable means of lessening the drudgery of a pianist's daily gymnastics. The exercises have the effect of strengthening the fingers to a remarkable degree, the result being that confidence and power are greatly increased, while effort is reduced and time saved. I recommend your excellent invention wherever I can, and with every confidence."

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.
St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance, astonished me.
"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."
HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.R.C.O.

Owing to increased output, we have reduced the price of our Popular Model to 14 guineas cash. Deferred payments if desired.

PUPILS PREPARED FOR A.R.C.M. AND L.R.A.M. EXAMS.

"Mr. Garcia—himself a fine artist and the inheritor of a great tradition and a great name—has some most promising pupils. It was particularly pleasant to hear voices, so well placed and well poised, smooth and even in tone, from the lowest to the highest notes, showing a control which too few learn to exercise."—Daily Telegraph.

"A work that should be of interest to all singers, young or old, is Albert Garcia's newly-published edition of his grandfather's 'Art of Singing.' There are many famous cases of inherited talents in the arts, but not many where the same branch of the profession has been followed by successive generations, and the case of the Garcias is probably unique."—Daily Telegraph.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

CHORALES

HARMONIZED BY

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH

COLLECTED AND ARRANGED IN MELODIC ORDER

BY

H. ELLIOT BUTTON

This Collection of Chorales harmonized by Bach contains, it is believed, all those that he arranged for voices. It includes also an Index by means of which any Chorale can easily be found if the first few notes of the melody are known.

Price ... ... Cloth, Ten Shillings and Sixpence

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

DAILY TELEGRAPH

"The task of making this noble collection has been undertaken by Mr. H. Elliot Button, who has made the volume particularly useful to organists and choirmasters by arranging the chorales in melodic order and providing an ingenious Melodic Index by means of which a particular Chorale may be found in a moment. Organists, indeed, may find themselves in clover by exploring the latest publications of this house."

BIRMINGHAM POST

"The compiler of this volume is H. Elliot Button, who has made an ingenious musical index based on the first note of each melody. The system also allows of all the harmonizations of a melody being kept together, and the student of Bach will find this an extremely interesting volume."

DAILY MAIL

"Mr. H. Elliot Button is a hard and conscientious worker on behalf of music. His research work is invaluable, and his latest work of compilation has resulted in the collection of 'Chorales Harmonized by Johann Sebastian Bach' which appears to be the first complete and comprehensive edition in one volume . . . . The Melodic Index which Mr. Button has introduced, in addition to the usual indices, shows remarkable ingenuity. By recourse to this unique invention no difficulty is experienced in immediately satisfying one's requirements . . . . There is evidence of great painstaking labour in this work, and apart from its value as a work of reference, the collection is redolent of melodic and harmonic wealth which will be found useful by pianists and organists for many and varied purposes."

YORKSHIRE POST

"The chorales are most clearly printed on good paper, and the book is one that will commend itself to all church organists."

ABERDEEN PRESS AND JOURNAL

"A complete and reliable collection of chorales harmonized by Bach has long been needed. It now appears in a handsome edition published by Novello. No longer need the student laboriously plough through the oratorios, the cantatas, and the motets in search of the various harmonizations of this or that chorale. He will find them all in Mr. Button's book, together with those chorales used by Bach in works no longer extant, but which have been accepted as authentic upon the evidence of Bach's greatest son . . . . The present volume is invaluable; to the student a real boon, and a source of endless pleasure.

SUNDAY MERCURY

Messrs. Novello have given to the world a wonderful book. J. S. Bach was, is, and ever will remain the most wonderful of all the great masters. The book is collected and arranged in melodic order by H. Elliot Button, who has indeed done the work with competence and amazing thoroughness."

YORKSHIRE HERALD

"The collection is admirably arranged; a chronological index of titles, an ingenious melodic index, invented by the author, combined with excellent type and binding make it a handsome volume."

TABLET

"Mr. Elliot Button has become our benefactor in giving us a fine folio edition of the Bach chorales on a very convenient plan. The melodic index is so contrived that even when you have completely forgotten the words of a particular chorale it is soon hunted down. This well-printed volume is handsomely bound in cloth gilt."

CHURCH TIMES

"The Bach lover will be delighted to add this fine compilation to his music library."

PREFACE.

THIS Selected Edition will contain in one complete series of volumes those songs, ballads, carols, chanteys, &c., from the Author's Collection of traditional music which, in his opinion, are the most characteristic and most suitable for purposes of publication.

The Collection is the product of twenty years' work in the towns and country districts of England and among the English inhabitants of the Southern Appalachian Mountains of North America, and comprises —counting variants, and dance, as well as vocal, airs—some five thousand tunes. A certain number of these have been published from time to time during the period of collection, but, as the Somerset Series, in which the bulk of these appeared, is now out of print, and as, moreover, further additions are unlikely to be made to it, the Collection can now be reviewed as a whole unfettered by past commitments.

WAGNER'S LEADING MOTIVES

BY HUGH ARTHUR SCOTT

It is late in the day to be discussing the leading motive principle, but some remarks on the subject in George Ainslie Hight's new 'Life of Wagner' seem to suggest that even yet the full wonder and significance of Wagner's invention and practice in this respect may be usefully dwelt upon.

I say 'invention' advisedly, for it is surely the greatest nonsense to pretend that in this matter Wagner merely developed and extended a pre-existing practice. It is, I am aware, the usual thing to say this—in which respect Mr. Hight faithfully follows tradition:

> It is sometimes supposed that Wagner invented a new method of composition by labelling material objects, things, persons, or perhaps situations and ideas, with musical phrases, so that you had to get up these labels to know what the music meant.

And again:

> The term Leitmotif is nowhere used by Wagner, and was not invented by him; nor did he invent the method of using musical motives and reminiscences, though he adopted and developed it to an extent unknown before.

To which it can only be replied that whether Wagner did or did not invent or use the term Leitmotif, his use of the method was something so utterly and completely different from anything previously known as to be indistinguishable from an entirely new invention. Earlier composers, such as Mozart and Weber, may have had their recurring themes now and again, but to liken such tentative and rudimentary efforts to the marvellous system which Wagner evolved and perfected, whereby the whole score—composed of one continuous network of significant themes—is built up on this principle from beginning to end, is surely to confuse the acorn with the oak.

To realise this it is only necessary to recall how little these early 'leading motives' actually count so far as the average hearer is concerned. In the ordinary way no one ever thinks of them or even knows of their existence—such an utterly insignificant part do they play in the general scheme—whereas in the case of Wagner, as we all know, it is the leading motives and nothing else which supply the materials of the entire musical fabric, with the enormous gain that even when the action is dullest and the vocal parts least important the musical interest is continuously maintained by the never-ceasing play and interplay of the orchestral themes.

Take as an example such an instance as that afforded by Pogner's Address in the first Act of 'Die Meistersinger.' The speech itself is merely a matter-of-fact statement of Pogner's plans for the proposed singing contest, which in an opera of the older type could have taken no other shape than that of a long, dull recitative or aria parlante. Wagner, however, by means of his leading motives, makes it full of musical interest from beginning to end: for while Pogner is speaking in the level unemotional tones appropriate to the occasion, the ear is enchanted by the lovely orchestral comments in terms of the various appropriate motives.

And this is only one of countless similar instances which could be cited. Surely it was not the least of Wagner's achievements to have devised and perfected this wonderful system which has added so enormously to the resources of the composer and the possibilities of operatic music? It may all seem easy and obvious enough now that it has been done—'For all can raise the flower, when all have got the seed'; but it needed a genius to do it in the first instance.

Mr. Hight in his curiously inadequate and unilluminating chapter on the subject draws a distinction between what he regards as legitimate leading motives associated with persons, emotions, and so on, lending themselves readily to the purposes of musical characterisation, and illegitimate ones, associated with material objects and other things less easily illustrated in this way. As he puts it:

> A material object as such is not amenable to musical treatment. There is no musical phrase which could express, for example, a ring or a sword; for these we have names; music is superfluous, and becomes a caricature. It can, I think, scarcely be denied that Wagner in the earlier portions of the 'Ring' used his motives injudiciously.

But this is surely being needlessly critical. Admitting that some things and ideas lend themselves better to musical expression than others, why attempt to set needless limits to the application of the principle so long as the results are musically satisfactory?

The point is that music of some sort or another has to be provided, and if a composer finds it possible to invent characteristic musical themes—even though they be purely arbitrary in a sense—for inanimate objects, such as a sword or a ring, which he can employ with such supreme effectiveness as Wagner does in his musical fabric, why should anyone say him nay? It is indeed impossible to draw any hard and fast dividing line between legitimate and illegitimate subjects for musical illustration, and there is not the slightest need to attempt to do so. Who but the veriest pedant would object to the sword motive, for instance, of which Wagner makes such grand use throughout the 'Ring,' because it happens to be one of the supposed 'illegitimate' type?

Mr. Hight says that Wagner never mentioned leading motives himself, or recognised their existence But what is that to the point? As Miss Bella Wilfer (wasn't it?) said, when some one was shocked by her allusion to a lady's legs, 'We know they're there,' and there is no explaining them away. It is indeed a little difficult to understand what is Mr. Hight's attitude on the subject. We might gather from certain of his remarks that he considers it almost derogatory to Wagner's genius to recognise this feature of his music at all!

Mr. Hight would wish to have it believed, apparently, that there was no conscious and deliberate employment of leading motives on Wagner's part at all, and that it came about almost by accident—or at all events without his being aware of it himself—that he used the same themes again and again in the way he does. As if he worked so purely intuitively and instinctively that it was merely in response to some subtle and inexplicable creative prompting that when the spear, say, or the tarn-helm, or the ring was mentioned, the same corresponding musical idea invariably suggested itself. But is there anyone who could believe this?

Doubtless Wagner's glorious musical ideas were in the first instance—in many cases at all events—the outcome of what is conveniently called inspiration, as distinguished from deliberate invention and manufacture—having come to him when in that semi-somnambulistic condition which he described more than once. But to suppose that there was any process other than conscious and deliberate in his subsequent use and development of these same ideas is quite ridiculous. It is even obvious, indeed, that many of the themes themselves were often formed and shaped quite deliberately as the result of conscious reflection—a fragment of one making up a portion of another, the same intervals appearing in different rhythms, and so on, in a way suggesting unmistakably deliberate manufacture rather than intuitive inspiration.

Nor does it detract in the slightest degree from Wagner's creative genius that he should have gone to work sometimes in this way. On the contrary, it is one of the chief sources of the inexhaustible interest and supreme effectiveness of his music that he adopted this course. And to the same cause must also be ascribed, of course, the marvellous homogeneity and distinctive quality of the music in the case of each of his different works. The music is so much of a piece because of this close inter-relationship of the themes.

As for the endless ingenuity and skill which he displayed, working on these lines, in the matter of thematic metamorphosis and development, examples are hardly necessary nowadays, but I may perhaps be permitted to call attention to one which is less familiar than some. I allude to the motive known as that of the Treaty (or sometimes the Spear) in the 'Ring,' and the wonderful way in which is developed out of it subsequently the glorious theme known as that of Brunnhilde's Submissive Justification. In its original form as the 'Treaty' motive, it is simply a long descending scale unharmonized:

one of the plainest, and it might be said, least interesting of all the 'Ring' themes, albeit it often comes in impressively enough. But now mark what a truly marvellous transmutation this same plain, almost forbidding, theme undergoes when by a few magical touches it is converted later into the Brunnhilde motive named. With hardly the alteration of a single note, but simply by introducing leaps to the octave at certain points, by changing the mode, modifying the rhythm, and by the addition of gorgeous harmonies, Wagner transforms it out of all recognition into one of the grandest and noblest themes in the whole of the 'Ring':

Ex 2.

Inspiration, invention, or deliberate manufacture—who can say which played the greater part here? And what does it really matter?

NORTH'S 'MEMOIRES OF MUSICK'

By Jeffrey Pulver

As one of the most important sources of information on the state of music in 17th-century England, Roger North's 'Memoires' deserve a place among the works to which we owe a debt. Slight as they may be, incomplete and one-sided though they are, they remain a work of some value. In spite of the legendary character of the earlier part, and the insufficiency of the author's knowledge in the sections dealing with Continental music, the pages devoted to the generation represented by the writer are of great importance to the student of that period, for they contain information out of North's own personal experiences which fill in many gaps in our histories of Stuart music. He brought a legally-trained mind to bear upon his subject, and his criticism is generally remarkable for unbiassed judgment and clear perception of causes and effects. At the same time, North was essentially a child of his period, and a conservative pupil of conservative teachers.

Roger North was the youngest son of Dudley fourth Lord North, and was born in Suffolk on September 3, 1653. He was brought up in the study of law, and as a protégé of his favourite brother, Francis, he achieved a certain distinction in legal circles. There will be no need to enlarge upon his activities in this field in an article of this nature, but it should be recorded that Roger North and Sir Charles Porter were 'the only two honest lawyers I have met with' (Clarendon). The whole family was a musical one. Roger's brother, Francis, when he was Lord Keeper, still practised the bass-viol assiduously, and was also a good performer on that instrument, 'lyra-way.' It is not to be determined with certainty as to who was responsible for the musical training of these brothers, but there is no doubt that John Jenkins had a good deal to do with it. This genial and popular bass-viol player and composer spent a number of years in the establishment of Lord North at Kirtling, in Norfolk, entering in 1660. He taught music to Roger and Montague North, and was paid at the rate of one pound a quarter. Jenkins's financial matters were treated by him in a very care-free manner, and doubtlessly he added the comforts he enjoyed in such houses to the comparatively small pecuniary remuneration he received. North, in the 'Memoires' under consideration, says that 'I never heard that he articled with any gentleman, where he resided, but accepted what they gave him' (v. also my article on 'John Jenkins' in Musical News for August, 1914).

The 'Memoires of Musick,' by Roger North, are best known to us from Rimbault's edition, prepared in 1846. The original manuscript is a quarto containing two hundred and sixty-five pages, of which a hundred and eighty-five contain a treatise entitled 'The Musicall Grammarian.' The manuscript was in the possession of the family for over a hundred years, after which George Townsend Smith, organist of Lynn, obtained possession of it from the dealer into whose hands it had come. Rimbault says that Smith

> . . . lost no time in communicating the existence of the manuscript to the Council of the Musical Antiquarian Society, and, in the most liberal manner possible, offered to place it at their disposal for publication. The Council, not feeling authorised to commence a series of literary publications, suggested its independent publication.

The 'Memoires' were first brought to the notice of the public by Dr. Burney, who saw the manuscript while it belonged to the Rev. Dr. North, Prebend of Windsor, and who quoted from it at great length in his 'History of Music.' The 'Musicall Grammarian' has never been printed, but another autograph of it is in the British Museum as Add. MS. 32,533.

The 'Memoires of Music, being some Historico-Critticall Collections of that Subject' (1728), cover a vast amount of ground. The author begins with the modes of Ancient Greece and says that 'these assuming Greeks would needs' arrogate to themselves the title of music's discoverers. He, of course, believed that the art 'had a higher original, and that is the use of voices, and language among men.' He thought that the realisation that men possessed voices would soon have caused 'them to stumble upon the exercise we call singing.'

Biblical times then claim his attention. He discusses the construction of the Greek tetrachords and the foundations of the scale, and gives some account of the instruments used in classic times, and the revival of diatonic music in Greece occasioned by the improvement in the instruments of that country, until its decadence there was followed by the decline in Rome also. He states that it

> . . . proceeded from bad to worse till it sunk in the Gothic warrs, and by means of the Christian Churches was happily revived, or rather preserved, and thereby derived to us.

In making these statements he ignores the great claim of Ancient Egypt as an 'originall'; but he cannot, of course, be blamed for an ignorance caused by the absence of information. It was not until the later discoveries and excavations in the land of the Nile that anything of importance was known of the state of Egyptian music in the days anterior to those of Greek culture. His account of the development of the instruments of music from the earliest organs to the 'Violl Gothick' is necessarily incomplete and often inaccurate; but taken as a whole, his performance as concerns this early period is no worse than that of the other 17th-century investigators.

It is when he deals with the practices of his own times and those immediately preceding them—a period of which he was informed by the knowledge imparted to him by his teachers, older friends, and his own experience—that he treads on safer ground; and when he does so, his work becomes more useful to us. His pages dealing with the music of James I. and Charles I. are full of interesting material. He tells us that the work of the masters of music who flourished during these two reigns 'lay most in compositions for Violls.' It was, indeed, the 'great age' of the flat-backed, many-stringed instruments, and the work of the men of the period is of great musical and historical value. The viols and the lutes, in fact, almost held the monopoly among cultured amateurs, for the violin was as yet 'scarce knowne.' North, on this point, is probably more correct than a great many later authorities, for it is highly unlikely that the violin in its modern form became popular in England—especially among professional musicians—until the last few years of the reign of Charles I. Rimbault, in a foot-note, questions North's statement on this subject, but is himself in error. While on this topic it may be as well to remember that Rimbault's notes are by no means of uniform value—several glaring errors laying the rest of his information under suspicion. A new annotated edition of the North 'Memoires' would not come amiss just now, while interest in our early music is reviving, and its study would be found to be entertaining as well as instructive.

North's account of Jenkins, and the methods employed in viol-playing during his life-time, is perhaps the best we have. His personal acquaintance with the famous violist explains the many details he is able to give, and in his pages he makes the 17th-century musician's life appear before us in an intensely interesting light. He draws attention to the introduction of the French style by Charles II., to the formation of the King's band of twenty-four violins 'after a French model,' gives a good account of the effect produced by the celebrated violinist Thomas Baltzar on the musicians of that century, and mentions some of the foreign composers and performers who still influenced the more orthodox of the English musicians in their struggles against the new style beloved by Charles II. His description of the first public concerts given in England—those of John Banister the Elder, who, besides being the first to institute open concerts to which the general public was admitted on payment of a fee, was also the founder of a school of violin-playing at Whitefriars—are very valuable. So also is his account of the music-drama (the entertainments which he happily terms 'Semi-Operas —half musick and half drama'), quoting as examples Davenant's 'Circe,' the anonymous 'Fayery Queen,' Betterton and Purcell's 'Dioclesian,' and Dryden and Purcell's 'King Arthur.' He alludes to the conquest of the French style by the Italian, and has a good deal to say on the performance of the Italian violinist, Nicola Matteis—the Signor Nicola or Nicholao of the Diaries of Pepys and Evelyn. The last few years of his life are not so fully treated; he confesses that he had not kept himself in touch with the most recent developments, 'being so many years an alien to the faculty, and at present a deprivado.'

The mere existence of the 'Memoires,' taken with or without the knowledge that Roger North found time in his busy professional and social life to devote to the study of practical and theoretical music and its literature, is in itself eloquent testimony in favour of the assertion that the influence of the Elizabethan age was still making itself felt, though now only among the more serious-minded and conservative of the musicians, amateur and professional. Every word that we can glean from North's period is of value to us, for he lived during a period of transition; one that saw the culmination of instrumental performance and composition, the highest flights of Viol and Lute technics, the rise of the declamatory style in vocal music, the evolution of the dramatic and the programmatic in the musical art, the descent of the opera from its parents the Masque and the 'semi-opera,' and the glories of the Purcellian era. He lived through the last age during which the music of this country could be said to be truly English in spirit and character, although in his later years foreign, and especially French, influences in vocal music and Italian in instrumental music, were making themselves felt. They were eventful years in the history of English music through which Roger North passed; he was born during the Commonwealth, before the influence of men like Orlando Gibbons and William Byrd had quite faded away, and lived until the very year in which the partnership between Heidegger and Handel was dissolved.

LISZT'S MUSIC, THE PUBLIC, AND A MORAL

By M.-D. Calvocoressi

As I explained in the June Musical Times, my present object is to urge music-lovers and concert-givers to concentrate upon the very best in Liszt's output, leaving severely alone, at least for a period, all works of his that are not significant enough really to matter. There exist plenty of things by Liszt which are not devoid of beauty, but do not embody a kind of beauty which he alone was capable of revealing. Even among the acceptable things from his pen, how many are there that none but he could have written, and whose significance remains unimpaired even after imitation of their outward characteristics has wearied us as, nowadays, imitation of Wagner's, or Brahms's, or Debussy's devices wearies us?

I mentioned a few of these outstanding works of his in my previous articles, and had intended to give a full list of his best music according to my own views. I have given up the idea, and must explain why.

The list, on the whole, would have been very short. My standard may be right or wrong, but it surely is severe. I hold that Liszt's music should be judged according to the very highest standard which he himself sets. By retaining only the very best of his work we shall learn to judge him more fairly—to judge him, indeed, as we judge other great composers, or nearly. Yet many of Liszt's admirers will perhaps think that advocacy so exclusive as mine will do Liszt's cause more harm than good. Only the other day I was telling a singer that I could name a dozen truly admirable songs by Liszt, whereupon he indignantly retorted, 'And I could name you thirty!'

I am, perhaps, over-fastidious. But as everybody is allowed the right, without challenge, to be over-fastidious with regard to Liszt (I shall revert to this point presently), I shall avail myself of the privilege and give a few more examples of my own preferences.

To begin with the pianoforte works: even in the 'Années le Pélerinage' there is much for which I have absolutely no use. In the first book, the only piece which I love is the 'Eglogue,' one of the most delightful things ever written for the pianoforte. The 'Vallée d'Obermann' is interesting for the early, sporadic traces of the real Liszt which it contains—but this concerns the student rather than the concert-goer pure and simple.

Of the contents of the second book I would retain for performance only the lovely 'Sposalizio' and the 'Fantasia quasi Sonata.' The latter is very beautiful, although a trifle long; only a most capable and inspired pianist will do full justice to the work.

I must confess that the three Petrarca Sonnets in the same book strike me as extremely commonplace. They are examples of a kind of music with which I have no patience, whether it be written by Liszt or by others.

The third book is of paramount significance, and contains no single piece which I should not commend for performance. Its artistic value has often been challenged. For instance, Dannreuther, in the 'Oxford History of Music,' declares that it is a 'a collection of lesser value, belonging to Liszt's old age.' And the reason for this attitude is that much in it was considered as 'purely experimental'—which it is indeed, but in a way which has since proved to be not only quite successful but unusually fertile. Jointly with the 'Eglogue' in the first book, this set of pieces ushers in a new spirit as well as new methods in pianoforte writing; hence it may have proved disconcerting at first. But nowadays, knowing all that composers such as Debussy, Ravel, and Bartok have done on entirely similar lines, we are in a better position to see, in the Liszt pieces, the achievement beyond the experiment.

This again applies to the 'Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses.' In the 'Etudes d'Exécution Transcendante' the most substantially interesting are, I think, 'Chasse-Neige,' 'Mazeppa,' 'Feux Follets,' and the Etude in F minor. Most of these, as well as the Paganini Etudes, are spoilt for the average concert-goer, as Liszt's beautiful Sonata is, as Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Italian Concerto are, by being too frequently included in the programmes of mediocre pianists.

Of the fifty-seven songs about a dozen are first-rate, and another dozen or so are really good. These, so far as I can see, are not the most popular. I often wish that more attention were paid to them, and less to things such as the 'Three Gypsies' and the 'Lorelei,' which I consider poor.

A certain book of twenty of Liszt's songs with English words, in common use here, contains most of his feeblest songs and but one or two of the good ones. In another, of thirty songs, I noted the omission of admirable things such as 'Ich möchte Hingehn,' 'Wer nie sein Brot mit Tränen ass,' 'Der Glückliche,' 'Die Glocken von Marling,' 'Wie singt dir Lerche,' 'Blumen und Duft,' 'An Edlitam,' 'Die Stille Wasserrose,' 'Einst wollt ich,' 'Die Fischertochter,' 'Sei still' (this list is not arranged in order of my own preferences). The only really fine songs included in these thirty are 'Du der du vom Himmel bist,' 'Es rauschen die Winde,' 'Nimm einen Strahl,' 'Schwebe,' 'Die Vatergruft,' 'Uber aller Gipfeln,' and 'Wieder möcht' ich dir begegnen,' while room is found for cheap stuff such as 'Der Alpenjäger' and 'Oh quand je dors.'

The editors responsible for the selections I refer to might simply retort that their views happen not to coincide with mine. Granting that they selected what they considered best, and not what they considered most saleable, the reply still points to the very moral which I am leading up to.

Why do opinions differ more as to the relative value of Listz's works than is the case with any other composer of equal standing? Simply because he is the only composer of his standing whose works are not in any measure 'consecrated,' and upon whose merits tradition holds no established balance of opinion for the guidance of the public at large and of the more docilely imitative writers. Therefore everybody feels more free to examine Liszt's works as critically as he pleases. Indeed, the more depreciatory the result of the examination, the more 'critical' they will seem.

There may be too much of the other extreme with regard to composers of genius who are an object of common and traditional admiration. On this point I shall quote (not for the first time) France's dictum, 'Les œuvres que tout le monde admire sont celles que personne n'examine.'

The less works are examined, the safer they are from the results of searching (and at times carping) criticism. They are all the safer owing to the fact that when a consecrated work becomes an object of disparaging criticism, the usual result is not to stimulate critical thinking, but to call forth contemptuous smiles and angry protests. This is exactly what would occur with regard to Liszt's music if he was a consecrated composer. As he is not, we dare notice in his works defects often no greater than those which we respectfully overlook in the works of consecrated composers. (Again I must refer readers to Mr. Ernest Newman's articles in the Musical Times, 1911.)

The real reason why Liszt is not a consecrated composer is that for a long time his works did not attract the attention they deserved. He was as regardless of the fate of his own compositions as he was keen on conducting propaganda for the works of others, and did little, if anything, to push his music to the front. And at the outset, few people took notice of his achievements Their voices, moreover, were not loud enough to be heard amid the turmoil of voices engaged in praising the works of his great contemporaries and successors. We are all more or less creatures of habit; and it is a great pity that no habit of admiring Liszt's masterpieces should have taken its rise, whereas a number of detractors, busy from the days when Brahms, Joachim, and their group issued (in 1860) what Mr. Newman rightly describes as their 'preposterous manifesto against the "music of the future," laid the foundation for a habit of holding Liszt cheap.

This habit is vanishing gradually. It has ceased to exist in most countries, but persists in this. In a survey of British contemporary music which appeared in the Italian periodical, l'Esame (October, 1924), Mr. Edward J. Dent remarked:

> There is no continental country which has not been profoundly influenced by Liszt; but in England the best musicians feel a profound horror for him. The only composer who shows some trace of his influence is Elgar.

It is very much to be regretted that the unavoidable reaction in Liszt's favour — for unavoidable it is, in the normal course of things —should be thus delayed in a country so progressive, on the whole, as this. It is also to be regretted that Liszt's output should contain so much that justifies the attitude of Liszt's detractors. But even then there is no excuse for the people who are so short-sighted, or so careless, as to overlook the many works that show Liszt's greatness.

THE NATURE OF HARMONY

By Matthew Shirlaw

At the present day it is frequently remarked that there is no theory of harmony. In other words, old systems of harmony have broken down, and nothing has arisen that can take their place. 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,' and while old theories were sufficient for the explanation of the harmonic practice of a former time, modern harmony has developed in such a way as to render these theories practically effete. Attempts are still being made, it is true, to explain chord formation or generation by means of the random selection of sounds from the harmonic series—sounds which are, for the most part, out of tune. So able a writer and theorist as the late Prof. Prout, however, discarded such a method of chord generation; not because he had discovered a better one, for he was unable to put any other method in its place. The impossibility of explaining harmony in this way becomes, or ought to become, more and more manifest. Such a method, indeed, is scarcely worth the attention of the serious musician.

What is wanted at the present day is not an 'up-to-date' theory that will bring 'modern' harmony easily within the grasp of the youthful composer. It is much more necessary and important that, instead of weaving theories, conjectural for the most part, or building systems without a solid foundation, we should endeavour to ascertain the truth concerning harmony itself—not 'modern' harmony alone, nor indeed the harmony of any particular epoch, for it is impossible to draw a hard and fast line between various periods of musical history; they are inseparably connected. If there is anything good in 'modern' music, it has its roots in the past; and if there is anything good in modern harmony—and without being unduly optimistic we may imagine it contains pure gold as well as dross—it also has its roots in the past. If it contains anything of lasting or of real artistic value, it is not, as is sometimes thought, an entirely new creation contradicting, or entirely overturning, established harmonic principles.

Before we attempt to bring the theory of harmony 'up to date,' before we attempt to explain modern harmony, are we quite sure that we are able to explain the harmony of Haydn or Mozart, or even of Bach or Handel, nay, even the harmony of a simple diatonic chorale, innocent of a single chromatic chord? It is a somewhat sobering fact that in spite of the wonderful intuitions and conjectures of theoretical geniuses like Rameau, Tartini, Hauptmann, and others, in spite of the valuable and lasting work accomplished by these men, no one, no theory, whether of the 20th or any other century, can furnish us with a rational explanation as to what happens, harmonically speaking, in a simply harmonized chorale.

To take three of the most distinguished men who have investigated the subject of harmony, viz., Tartini, Helmholtz, and Riemann: The first is famous as a gifted composer and violinist; the second as one of the most distinguished scientists of his time; the third possessed an unequalled knowledge of musical and harmonic theory, of its history and development. All three bring forward convincing reasons why the major harmony should be regarded as arising from the first five or six partial tones of the harmonic series. That it does actually so arise is a fact beyond dispute. So far, so good, and if other chords could be generated in the same way, it is highly improbable that anyone would seriously object to such a principle of chord generation. But the trouble begins as soon as the attempt is made to explain other chords as arising in a similar way. Examine only two, and those the most important after the major harmony, viz., the minor harmony and the chord of the dominant 7th. In the minor harmony, as a-c-e, the sound c cannot be discovered among the upper partial tones of a; and in the chord of the dominant 7th, as g-b-d-f, the sound f cannot be discovered among the upper partial tones of g, even if we extend the harmonic series to infinity. Further, it is highly probable, as Rameau, Hauptmann, Riemann, and other of the most eminent writers have conjectured, that the major key-system arises from a central major harmony, together with that of its upper 5th, or Dominant, and that of its lower 5th, or Subdominant: thus, f-a-c-e-g-b-d. But while it is easy to understand how the Dominant g arises, seeing that it is the 5th of c, and one of its first upper partial tones, where does the Subdominant, with its harmony, come from? f is not the 5th of c; on the contrary, c is the 5th of f. In the key-system of c major, c has a pre-eminent position, as Tonic; g ranks next in importance, as Dominant; while f, as Subdominant, is subordinate to both. The actual result of the order f-a-c-e-g-b-d, however, is that f turns out to be far and away the most important of the lot, for it becomes ground-tone and generator—c is its 5th, while d is the 5th of g: i.e., f is the generator of all the sounds heard above it. The theory of harmony, as Helmholtz, Rameau, Tartini, Riemann, all most gifted theorists, have insisted, has an indisputably firm and solid basis in the natural generation of the major harmony. But almost from the outset it is confronted with what appear to be insuperable difficulties.

Is it necessary, then, to seek some other basis for the theory of harmony? Attempts in this direction have already been made. Moritz Hauptmann decided against a physical basis, and adopted a metaphysical one. But Hauptmann, to whose 'theoretical apperceptions' Helmholtz alludes with admiration, and justly so, was not successful. His famous work, 'Die Natur der Harmonik und der Metrik,' is not merely an exciting record of hair-breadth escapes and desperate situations; it is a proof of the inadequacy, even in the hands of a theorist of superlative ability, of a purely metaphysical basis for the theory of harmony. Another well-known 19th-century writer and historian, F. J. Fétis, evolved a theory, or what he considered to be such, on a psychological basis. Fétis begins by pouring ridicule on all his predecessors from Rameau onwards, who had sought for the origin of harmony in acoustical phenomena; and he ends by deriving the chord of the dominant 7th from the partial tones 4,5,6,7 of the harmonic series, apparently quite oblivious of any inconsistency. To be convinced of the futility of the Fétis method, it is only necessary to read his book. If a theory of harmony on a physical basis creates difficulties, that on a metaphysical basis would appear to create impossibilities.

Where such men have failed, and in the face of such difficulties, who may hope to succeed? But difficulties have never acted as any real deterrent to the human spirit. It may, indeed, be asked, Is a theory of harmony really necessary? Apparently it is. There are problems to be solved quite as pressing as when Rameau, by his famous theory of the inversion of chords, introduced order at one stroke into the chaos in which the figured bass practicians at the beginning of the 18th century were floundering, and taught them to distinguish between the fundamental note and bass note of a chord. The mental workings of the musician are not so very different from those of other people. The average man may not be a philosopher, but without some synthesis of the impressions he is constantly experiencing as a sentient being, without some attempt to correlate the facts that are continually being presented to him, his life must be lived at a low level indeed. And there is no musician who does not find himself compelled, for an intensely practical reason, to correlate, to introduce order into the multitude of—apparently—unconnected facts, musical and harmonic, which present themselves to him from day to day. Indeed, he cannot help himself. It is one of the conditions of his intellectual life as a musician. And this is why works treating of harmony continue to be written.

There is still another way of meeting our difficulties—we may, ostrich-like, shut our eyes to them. This, to be sure, is the least satisfactory course of all. Yet, if we cannot explain harmony, there is a strong temptation to explain it away. We may say that, after all, chords have no reality, they are merely 'convenient fictions': that the practice of conceiving harmony vertically, instead of horizontally, is antiquated, played out; or that harmony is the result of the movements of the parts in polyphonic music: it must be conceived contrapuntally, i.e., horizontally. Whether this be true or no, it is certainly not true that harmony is an accident, the result of the fortuitous concurrence of the different parts or voices. Whether the counterpoint be that of Bach or Wagner, the harmony it embodies is the result, not of accident, but of careful calculation, of astonishing skill and genius, on the part of two consummate masters of the art of harmony. We cannot conceive counterpoint from a purely horizontal, i.e., a melodic, point of view, for melody is not counterpoint nor is counterpoint simply melody. Counterpoint is a 'simultaneous combination' of melodies. But melodies cannot be combined except on harmonic principles. The veriest novice in counterpoint is soon made aware of this fact; he cannot write a simple two-part counterpoint in the first species until he has made himself familiar with the elements of harmony.

The art of counterpoint consists, not in writing melodies merely, but in combining them. This means that the melodies themselves must be shaped in such a way that they can combine, so as to produce harmony: and not any kind of harmony, but a harmony that is correct, artistic, and that satisfies æsthetically. If this were not so, it would be no more difficult to write counterpoint in eight, or for that matter, eighty parts than in two parts: while the difficulties in the way of the composition of a canon 4 in 1, or even 40 in 1, would disappear.

Music, it is sometimes remarked, is something that occurs in time. Even if it be granted that music has a vertical as well as a horizontal aspect, does not the successive, the horizontal aspect so far transcend the vertical as to cause the latter to dwindle into comparative insignificance? But what does succession mean, and what is it that makes succession possible? We may regard the individual unit, the beat, the single sound, the isolated chord, as being nothing in themselves and so far as actual musical significance is concerned. This, if true, is least true of the chord, for the chord is a complex of several sounds. Beethoven begins and ends the Allegretto of his A major Symphony with an isolated chord. It cannot be said that this chord means nothing. On the contrary, it is a stroke of genius. Nor can it be said that the two masterful chords at the beginning of the 'Eroica' Symphony mean nothing. It may be maintained even more positively, however, that succession, continuity, is in itself as good as nothing, for it is plain that there can be no succession where nothing happens. If we sustain a sound or a chord on the organ for the space of half-an-hour, we may be conscious, through other factors, that time passes, but we are entirely unconscious of any musical succession. Were a whole day, a whole year to pass during which we felt nothing, thought nothing, willed nothing, i.e., were we entirely deprived of the means whereby we become conscious of time, such a day or year would be for us practically non-existent. It is not the mere lapse of time that is of consequence, but what happens in its course.

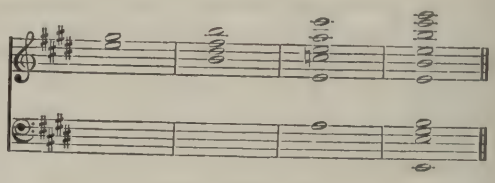
In actual fact, music does not fall on the ear in an unbroken stream, a continuous mass of tone. What Helmholtz says of melody is true of all music. In his 'Sensations of Tone,' he points out that alterations of pitch in melody take place by intervals, and not by continuous transitions:

> When the wind howls, and its pitch rises or falls in insensible gradations without any break, we have nothing to measure the variations of pitch, nothing by which we may compare the later with the earlier sounds, and comprehend the extent of the change. The whole phenomenon produces a confused, unpleasant impression. . . . We consequently find the most complete agreement among all nations that use music at all, from the earliest to the latest times, as to the separation of certain determinate degrees of tone from the possible mass of continuous gradations of sound, all of which are audible.

In rhythm, the same process may be observed with the utmost clearness. In rhythm we have succession, and without succession there can be no rhythm. But without the individual rhythmical unit there could be no succession. In measured music it is the beat that defines the rhythm, and renders it perceptible. The beat, again, may become merged in a larger rhythmical complex—the bar; while the bar itself, and even a bar group, may be apprehended as part of a still more comprehensive rhythmical structure. And, indeed, to comprehend rightly any musical work of art, it is necessary to gather up the successive moments of which it consists, to bind them intellectually into a comprehensive unity. All depends on the nature of these moments themselves. In the artistic masterpiece, each moment, each part, contributes its quota to the effect of the whole, and between each there exists the strictest and most logical connection, or relationship. This connection, this relationship, could not exist were music to fall on the ear in a continuous, unbroken stream of sound. The effect of the whole art-work depends on the nature of the parts of which it consists. Even if it be true, then, that in music continuity, or succession, is of paramount importance, we must bear in mind what succession means, and how it becomes possible. Now one of the principal factors in bringing about continuity in musical art is harmony. It is sometimes forgotten that harmony has to do not merely with isolated chords, but with chord succession. In harmonic music the ear is urged on from chord to chord. Even the simple, consonant, common chord lends itself to this onward pressure of the harmony. Of all chords, surely this is one which can stand by itself, be understood in itself, without regard to what precedes or follows it. And so it may. Yet, in the following succession of common chords with which Mendelssohn begins his 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture—and no one will have difficulty in recalling innumerable instances of a similar kind—the ear is urged onward, the mind is kept in actual suspense, until the final chord is reached:



The part played by harmony in bringing about a coherent and consistent continuity in music of such a nature that the whole process has the appearance of an organic development, as opposed to what is merely arbitrary or artificial, is strikingly exemplified in musical 'form,' even in such supreme forms as the symphony, the sonata, the concerto. So true is this, that Parry does not hesitate to describe such forms as 'harmonic forms.' Of form in music generally, he says:

> The means by which unity and proportion are arrived at in musical works are the relative distribution of keys and harmonic bases on the one hand, and of subjects, or figures, or melodies, on the other.

Any one may observe how musical form is affected by such a simple, even stereotyped, harmonic succession as the perfect cadence. The composer may use this cadence, or he may avoid it; but whether he uses it or avoids it—as is the tendency at the present day—it will very considerably affect the nature of the form.

Harmony, then, cannot be explained through counterpoint, continuity, or succession. Continuity, or succession, in itself can explain nothing. It would be much more reasonable to affirm that continuity, succession—indeed, counterpoint—are brought about by harmony, for melody itself depends on harmony and without harmony there could be no melody. Melody consists of sounds of different pitch, and these sounds, in all melody of artistic value, must bear to each other a definite relationship. They do not bear to each other a pitch relationship, for this is meaningless, except to it there be added tonal relationship. Tonal relationships do not arise—cannot arise—from any other source than harmony. When this matter is duly considered, it is not difficult to understand the meaning of Dr. Riemann's remark that 'Harmony is certainly the fountain-head from which all music flows.'

Ad Libitum

By 'FESTE'

A few months ago I ventured to commit myself to some definitely adverse opinions on certain developments in modern music. I did so because it seemed to me that there had been far too much playing for safety on the part of critics and reviewers. This caution took one of two forms. Sometimes the critic praised almost everything on general principles, as if he wished to make sure that in the event of a swan emerging from among the geese, he could not be accused of having missed it. Alternatively he took the cautious line that a final pronouncement on such a composer or work could not be made yet awhile; never should it be thrown up at him that he had failed to see the greatness of Milhaud or Pratella, as one or two of his predecessors had missed that of Beethoven and Wagner! The slips of certain early critics were always being brought forward—generally by some second-rate composer smarting from an unfavourable review—and held up as warnings.

For my part, I can never see a parallel between Beethoven and Wagner and the dozens of present-day experimentalists on whose behalf the utmost claimed—even by their most rabid adherents—is that they are doing something that has never been done before. Whether that 'something' is worth the doing, either in itself or as a piece of pioneer work, is a point that seems to be generally ignored. And even a pioneer is not necessarily a man to be followed. He may be merely hacking his way to a swamp, or to some other impasse that is quite perceptible to the onlookers, in which case his claim to notice lies in nothing else than his wrongheadedness. If he remained in the high road with the rest of us he would be unnoticed.

For such reasons as the above I did not hesitate to leave the fence and come down unmistakably on the side that is generally called 'reactionary.' That I was in good company was evident from the chorus of 'hear, hear!' that reached me from all sorts of unexpected quarters. It seemed to be ample and conclusive evidence as to the bursting of the 'progressive' bubble.

As for those 'awful warnings,' I have long had my doubts about the alleged lack of appreciation of the great composers by their contemporaries. The last time I had occasion to overhaul the biography of Beethoven, for example, I found myself wondering at the long-held popular legend that Beethoven was a neglected genius singing his heart out to a world that wouldn't listen. The lay mind likes to think of the great ones of the past as lonely souls, wasting their sweetness on an indifferent or even antagonistic world, and going down to obscure and unhonoured graves.

So far as the great composers are concerned, the lay mind can easily put itself in possession of the facts by reading Mr. Ernest Newman's latest book, 'A Musical Critic's Holiday.' (Cassell, 12*s.* 6*d.*)

The volume might also be called 'A Busman's Holiday,' seeing that it is the outcome of a few weeks' retreat in a country house furnished with a musical library so apt for Mr. Newman's purpose that it became a kind of arsenal. Hence this devastating broadside.

Mr. Newman says that he went away to think things over:

> I would put it that I am going up into a high mountain to pray, but that a musical critic's troubles are not, as a rule, of the sort in which prayer is indicated. But at any rate I am going up into a high mountain, and if I cannot save my critical soul there by prayer, perhaps I can by quiet thought.

The question he set out to wrestle with is one that has been very much in the air of late years:

> Can anything like a technical basis for criticism be discovered—something roughly corresponding to the technical fundamentals of composition?

And he suggests as a likely step in the right direction the 'study of a representative critic of the past, as a scientist would study an organism,'

> . . . trying to see just how the critical faculty functioned in him, the principles, true or false, on which he worked, how far he succeeded or failed, and why.

He takes as his representative old-time critic one Johann Christian Lobe, who wrote extensively at a time when the musical world was perturbed, pretty much as it has lately been, by startling developments of various kinds. He follows Lobe through a series of letters written to an inquiring young musician, and very entertaining and curiously up-to-date much of the old critic's pronouncements seem to be. In fact, as Mr. Newman says, we have only to change a few names, in order to make a good many passages apply to present circumstances. Sometimes Johann Christian came a cropper, as was inevitable in one who wrote so much, held strong views, and did not hesitate to fire them off. It is easy to point to the instances in which time has shown him to have been short-sighted, but in fairness we must remember that many of his pronouncements were made before the composers concerned had finished their work. He came to grief mostly over Schumann and Wagner; yet, as Mr. Newman shows, he was less to blame than appears at first sight:

> Contemporary criticism is always more apt to fasten on the weaknesses of a composer than on the virtues that will ensure his immortality.
> The contemporary critic is not far enough away from his subject to see him quite in the round; for one thing, the composer's work is not yet finished. The excellences in it are savoured quietly; the faults in it stir deeper reactions.

This of course is the familiar argument used against critics, but, as Mr. Newman points out:

> It is too often forgotten that a good deal of critical fault-finding was perfectly justified; if we do not insist on the faults now, it is because the perception of them is so universal that there is no necessity to > talk about them. To-day one would almost as little think of censuring Wagner for his mannerisms of style, such as his sequences, as one would of rushing into print to say that Queen Anne was dead; but a contemporary critic would have had every justification for pointing to these sequences as a weakness on the composer's part, and advising him not to indulge so copiously in them.

In fact, we are to-day far too lenient to the noddings of Homer. A good deal of poor stuff by great composers is swallowed complacently, while better music by lesser men is left on the shelf.

As for Lobe's strictures on Wagner, Mr. Newman shows that when they were uttered Wagner had written only 'Rienzi,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Lohengrin'; and for a longish period after 'Lohengrin' he was mainly occupied with writing prose:

> Lobe's criticism of him is based mostly on 'Opera and Drama,' which had just been published; and it is easy to imagine the effect that this and others of Wagner's prose works must have had on the average musician of the day, with their involved style, their rambling and hysterical political and social disquisitions, their dubious literary views, their disparagement of so many dead and living composers, and their exceedingly confused presentment of a new theory of opera, the validity of which could only be tested when the work written to illustrate it—the 'Ring'—was given to the world many years later. If we examine Lobe's criticism in detail, we see that it is practically all justified. Neither he nor anyone else at that time could know that, however muddled a thinker Wagner might be in politics or sociology . . . the musician in him was developing steadily and sanely in secret. All in all, for his time, Lobe judged him pretty fairly. At any rate, he was conscious of his unusual quality.

Though Mr. Newman's dissection of Lobe does not help us far in our effort to establish some principles of criticism, it makes good reading, and contains at least one warning that should not be lost on those of us who have to write on music. Lobe clearly allowed himself to be goaded into rash statements by the extravagances of some of the 'progressives' of the day. When, for example, he saw Schumann being ranked above Beethoven he not unnaturally replied by stressing some obvious faults in Schumann, and critics to-day are similarly tempted to belittle contemporary composers on whose behalf obviously extravagant claims are made by their coterie:

> The critic of to-day may perhaps be helped to strip the little problems of his own time of their inessentials by discovering what it was that prevented otherwise sound critics from doing so in the past. One of the causes I am sure was excess of reaction due to pure irritation at the follies of the more extreme partisans of each side.

Similarly, those of us who are termed 'reactionary' perhaps find it difficult to view quite fairly the work of certain contemporaries because the propaganda on their behalf consists largely of a sweeping dismissal of such a composer as Brahms as a 'flat-footed pedant,' or of Schumann as a love-sick something-or-other 'baying the moon.' That word 'reactionary,' by the way, is discussed by Mr. Newman. As antitheses he prefers 'classic' and 'romantic' to 'reactionary' and 'progressive,' 'conservative' and 'radical,' or 'age' and 'youth.' As he says, there was never a time when all the young people were on one side, and the old on the other. Lots of young musicians to-day are pro-Beethoven and anti-Schönberg; there are conservatives so young that they have hardly started their career, and radicals so old that they have finished theirs. And 'reactionary' and 'progressive' have no meaning in music, for what appears to be progress to-day may prove in a few years' time to have been a false move. The real 'progressives' will then be seen to be those who preferred to stand still or to move in another direction:

> All we can be sure of is that music is changing; and 'progress' is only the term given by excitable and self-complacent people to the form of change with which they happen to be most in sympathy; the man who calls himself a 'progressive' is merely indulging in a not very subtle form of self-flattery; he implies that he has a prophetic insight into the future that is denied to ordinary mortals.

The tendency to-day is to label as progressive and advanced anything that is a departure from the normal, either in matter or manner—especially manner. The futility of basing a claim of this sort on mere originality can be shown by countless examples from musical and literary history. Perhaps one of the best instances is that quoted by Mr. Newman. He gives us Burney's account of a Portuguese Abbé, named Costa. Costa, says Burney:

> . . . disdaining to follow the steps of others, has struck out a new road, both as composer and performer, which it is wholly impossible to describe; all I can say of his productions is, that in them melody is less attended to than harmony and uncommon modulation; and that the time is always difficult to make out, from the great number of ligatures and fractions; however, his music, when well executed, which happens but seldom, has a very singular and pleasing effect; but it is certainly too much the work of art to afford great delight to any eyes but those of the learned.

What became of this Abbé and his new road? Clearly his 'originality' was of the futile type that is so plentiful in modern music. As Mr. Newman remarks,

> . . . his misfortune was that he lived in the days when musical journalism was not. Had he been alive to-day he would assuredly have had an admiring article on him in one of the musical periodicals, with copious illustrations from his manuscripts, showing how different his music was from that of everybody else; he would have been hailed as one of the founders of the new and better order of things, and his eulogist would have publicly congratulated himself on being the first to call attention to so remarkable a genius.

(We could make a good shot at the name of one likely eulogist, and without much difficulty could even quote a few involved and sesquipedalian sentences from his imaginary columns!)

The complete disappearance of such original composers from the pages of history surely gives us a clue as to one method by which we may separate the chaff from the grain in contemporary music. Roughly speaking, the greatest composers have been the least original: the dashing experimental work has generally been done by the smaller men. The big ones have either disregarded the results of these experiments, or have taken the most promising and worked out their potentialities as it suited them. Your genius is more often found closing an epoch than opening one. Mr. Newman's theory is that a truly great composer has so much to say that his main concern is to say it; he has no time to waste over experiments. Probably the reverse may without offence be said of some of the experimentalists; feeling an itch for composition, and being short of ideas, they fall back on ingenuities of various sorts. Sometimes they hit on a dodge that in more capable hands proves fruitful; more often than not the ingenuity is as sterile as the very different kind that in old days expressed itself in the concoction of abstruse and 'freak' canons.

Having taken Lobe as a specimen critic and drawn a few lessons from him, Mr. Newman proceeds to study a period that, like our own, was one of radical change both in theory and practice—the epoch that began at about 1600. I have not space enough to discuss his exposition of this striking parallel. I can only recommend the reader to go to the book itself.

My closing comments have to do with another of the main points Mr. Newman set out to prove—namely, that generally speaking, great composers were appreciated by the bulk of the musical public of their time. He takes the cases of Bach, Mozart, Monteverde, Gesualdo, our own Elizabethans, Wagner, and others, and, it seems to me, produces very strong evidence for his argument that > . . . this theory of the inevitable failure of any generation to recognise its great composers is a fallacy, and a modern fallacy at that. I imagine it to be a product of the late 19th century, and to have had its origin among the Wagnerians. I fancy that if you had gone to a music-lover of any period between, say, 1500 and 1850, and told him, with tears in your eyes, that it was a sure sign of a composer's genius that the world ridiculed and reviled him, and that the great composer can only look to posterity for recognition, he would have laughed in your face. Every age, I think, has had a pretty accurate idea as to which composers were the greatest credit to it. The men who were most highly praised by their contemporaries were, in a vast majority of cases, the men whom the world recognises to-day as the biggest figures of their epoch.

I mentioned Beethoven as one of these supposedly neglected geniuses. Mr. Newman finds a mere page sufficient to knock the bottom out of that idea. As he says, Beethoven tells us himself that while he was still a young man publishers were fighting each other for the privilege of bringing out his works; his 'drawing' power is shown by the fact that his co-operation was constantly sought when specially important concerts were given at Vienna; and a new work was obtained for such events when possible. Mr. Newman quotes an article that appeared in a musical journal recently (I fancy it was the Musical Times), consisting of extracts from contemporary English criticisms on Beethoven, and designed to prove the futility and blindness of the critics. One of the London writers fell foul of the 'Diabelli' Variations, but he added that the air 'derives additional interest from having been selected as a theme by the greatest musical genius of the century.' Mr. Newman quotes similarly handsome epithets from English critics of the period, and adds:

> If to be deluged in your life-time with eulogies of this sort is to be universally misunderstood, there are few composers of to-day who would not pray for a similar misunderstanding of them.

The book is written with gusto—so much so that in his enjoyment Mr. Newman is apt to go back on his tracks and make some points more than once. Most of us will part company with him at times, of course, but in the main it seems to me that his contentions, shrewdly argued and backed up as they are, by solid evidence, are proved up to the hilt. I wish, though, that the title of the book were less misleading. It suggests another 'Musical Motley' rather than a first-rate contribution to the perennial debate on criticism. I put it in a handy part of my bookshelf, hoping that certain 'progressive' critics will follow Mr. Newman's example, and adjourn to the mountain-top for a bit of hard thinking. Perhaps they will then be able to give us some clear writing.

Two other newly-issued books have some connection with this subject. The first is Egon Wellesz's 'Arnold Schönberg' (Dent, 6*s*.), and an extremely well written and interesting book it is. (The translation, which seems admirable, is by W. H. Kerridge.) We are left with respect and admiration for Schönberg, without being convinced of the ultimate value of his later works. Only a very sanguine disciple will see much of a future for his 'Sprechton,' for example, and atonality and polytonality will probably lead to nothing but monotony. In case a reader wishes to know what 'Sprechton' is, I quote this description from Wellesz:

> The melody indicated for the speaking voice by notes . . . is not meant to be sung. The reciter has the task of transforming this melody, always with a due regard to the prescribed intervals, into a speaking melody. That is accomplished in the following way:
> (1) The rhythm must be kept absolutely strict, as if the reciter were singing.
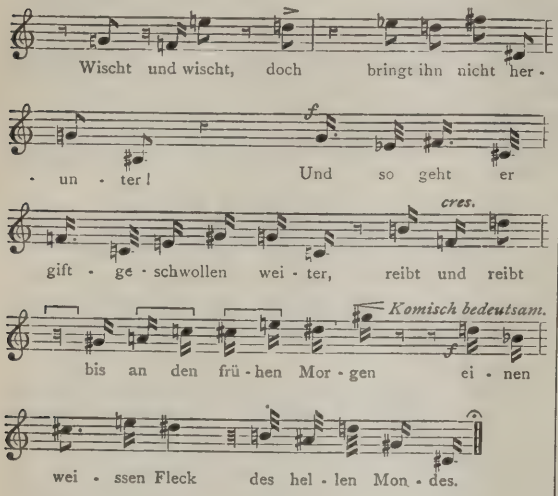
> (2) To emphasise fully the contrast between the sung note and the spoken note, whereas the sung note preserves the pitch, the spoken note gives it first, but abandons it either by rising or falling immediately after. The reciter must take the greatest care not to fall into a sing-song form of speaking voice; such is absolutely not intended. On the contrary, the difference between ordinary speech and a manner of speech that may be embodied in musical form, is to be clearly maintained. But again, it must not be reminiscent of song.

So far as we can understand the composer's intentions the only thing 'Sprechton' will be reminiscent of is rank bad singing. Here is a sample quoted in Mr. Myers's little book on 'Modern Music':



Wischt und wischt, doch bringt ihn nicht her -
- un - ter!
Und so geht er
cres.
gift - ge - schwollen wei - ter, reibt und reibt
Komisch bedeutsam.
bis an den frü - hen Mor - gen ei - nen wei - ssen Fleck des hel - len Mon - des.

(Certain notes are marked through the stem with a cross, inconvenient to reproduce here. Such notes are to be delivered in 'Sprechton.')

Mr. Myers thinks that 'this is an innovation in vocal technique, the importance of which it is impossible to ignore.' I admit the innovation, but deny the importance. Mr. Myers adds that 'it is of course too soon to be able to pronounce upon the question as to whether such methods are likely to be universally adopted in the future.' It is not a bit too soon. Mr. Myers may make up his mind at once that 'Sprechton' will not be universally adopted. We shall still hear involuntary specimens from singers with unresonant voices and a poor sense of pitch, but it will take no regular part in the material of composition.

Nor can we see much of a future for any music that demands so much rehearsal and such a prodigious effort from performer and listener as Schönberg's later works. Isn't a lot of it merely the 'originality' of the above-named Costa, developed to the *n*th degree? Mr. Newman discusses Schönberg's Op. 11, the 'Three Pianoforte Pieces,' and shows that Mr. Corder's ridiculing of them in 1911 has proved to be justified. Fourteen years is surely a sufficiently long time to test the value of a set of pianoforte pieces by so prominent a composer as Schönberg. Yet where are they? Mr. Newman says:

> We all know those Three Pianoforte Pieces, and I think that if the musicians of Europe and America were polled on the matter, ninety per cent. of them would say that Mr. Corder was right; they would not necessarily approve of his phrasing of his opinion, but they would think with him that the music is of no account as music, however interesting it may be to the theorist as one of the earliest specimens of atonality.

And I doubt very much if the bigger essays in the same vein will have any more interest for musicians generally when a further fourteen years have passed. Schönberg has written some beautiful music, but not lately. He is like too many of his contemporaries: they do well up up to the age at which the great composers of the past were at their best, or sometimes only approaching it. They then run dry, and are thrown back on mannerisms and tricks, or take to experimenting. The results appeal to a mere handful of theorists or highbrows of the type satirised in a recent issue of Punch, under the title 'Our Exclusives': 'Do you never read the weeklies?' 'Never. One feels that the only paper one could read with interest would be understood by so few people that it could never be published.'

Finally, here is another book bearing on the subject of criticism, 'Contemporary British Composers,' by Joseph Holbrooke (Cecil Palmer, 15*s*.). Mr. Holbrooke's generous appreciation of his two-score odd subjects does credit to his heart, and he is of course quite right in his hammering away at the point that what British music needs is not so much publication and first performances as repeated performance. (Some day the Carnegie Trust may begin to see this elementary fact.) Where Mr. Holbrooke fails is in going out of his way to administer his usual assault on musical critics. He gives a list of about twenty, says they suffer from 'verbal hæmorrhage,' considers that there is 'not sufficient (if any) conviction behind any of their matter,' and from time to time throughout the book heaves a half-brick at them. 'What their training is for their task is not known,' he adds. Well, this unknown training included at least one not unimportant detail—an ability to express themselves clearly and grammatically in their own tongue. This is a qualification Mr. Holbrooke has yet to acquire. Here are a few specimens of musical criticism as written by the critic's mentor:

> Frank Bridge would, and could, write like a master for the theatre without inviting Viennese musicians' work to London so often.
> Rare in these days indeed, when morphology and mordacity are dragged even into the musical arena by the daring red men. Peripatetic journeys are made to impossible regions of cacophony. Terminology is rife in the popular works of to-day. Abracadabra is in the scores and in the brain. Mysticity is a new move, cabbalistic rites are new tones. Iconoclastics are for the nutriment bottles of the students.

The following, on Vaughan Williams, ends with a delightful non sequitur:

> The Cockney element is not very strong in the 'London' Symphony. . . . I think this artist cannot lay claim to any originality, such as sleeping on the Embankment, or entering the houses of opium. . . . Verecund he is, and it is good in life as in art. . . . Vaughan Williams is not, as I have said, of ultra-music leanings, but if he has a life half as long as John Sebastian Bach, whom he favours in style, he will be satisfied, I am sure.

> How history does repeat itself, and the humans wallow in their own failings century after century! The Wagners die exhausted, and the next artist who arrives has the same ghastly task before him, and mithridatic solution is unknown.
> Musicians from the North would, to me, be harder and keener-edged than the Southerner. The North sees manufacture as the pursuit of life and art as a solecism. Havergal Brian has all the eleutheromania and fails to get it.

Of Bliss's 'Mêlée Fantasque' (or 'Fantastique,' as Mr. Holbrooke prefers to call it):

> Like all experimental songs, the singers have much the worst time of it.

Of Delius we are told that his early songs are

> . . . pulsating with streams of golden melody, and rapturous love music of intense espousement.

Nevertheless:

> In parentheses, we can say with certainty that Delius's art has remained rather unpopular because of his unparenetic attitude.

The moral is obvious: if you want popularity, be parenetic! Even the fact that Mr. Sydney Grew has written 'a warm panegyric' on Delius cannot save him:

> I fear many of us are only, even now, in a state of phonological phrenology.

And so on. I don't know whether Mr. Holbrooke wrote with a dictionary at hand, but certainly the reader will need one. The book is bad in other ways. Misprints abound—I have marked so many that space won't accommodate a list; the tables of works are badly planned; in some cases publishers' names are given, sometimes not; many titles are misspelt; the proportion of space accorded to the composers is odd. Felix White has five pages, Walford Davies four lines; Christopher à Becket Williams, a page, Ernest Walker, three lines; Leigh Henry, three pages, York Bowen, five lines; &c. There is no index.

In his innocence, Mr. Holbrooke has done the critics the best of turns by including a few lengthy quotations from Mr. Edwin Evans and Mr. Ernest Newman. From the former he takes a summing-up of the style of Lord Berners that is quite a model of what musical criticism should be—concise and full of suggestion. Mr. Holbrooke says of it:

> What all this means I would not venture to say, but I leave it to the high digestive powers of the reader, who may see the import of it after study.

Not everybody would be so ready to confess inability to understand a few sentences of plain English! Mr. Newman is drawn on for a criticism of Foulds's 'World Requiem.' Against it Mr. Holbrooke sets a chunk of chit-chat from 'Mr. London' of the Daily Graphic, and says:

> We must let these experts disagree on good things.

Does he seriously regard Mr. Hannen Swaffer as an expert in musical matters? Nobody else does, least of all Mr. Swaffer himself, I feel sure.

One would be more tolerant of such a slipshod performance if the author were not so fond of girding at musical journalists. As it is, he cannot complain if his work is judged from a literary standpoint. The critics themselves will find cause for nothing but satisfaction in Mr. Holbrooke's having thus delivered himself into their hands. A sentence from the chapter on Goossens, descriptive of what Mr. Holbrooke imagines to be their attitude towards that composer's music, pretty well expresses their delight at his own literary style:

> The demented critic rallies himself and pants in the rear, loudly chortling his delight of all this daring chiaroscuro.

But when the demented critic has finished rallying, panting, and chortling, he will still be at a loss for an expression that will give his views of the book in a few words. Joseph's own term, 'verbal hæmorrhage,' though graphic, hardly meets the case. Happily, Mr. Newman's recent trip to New York was not in vain, for he brought back the phrase that fills the bill. His Sunday Times article of June 14 (neatly headed 'Holbrooke s'en va-t'en guerre') ended thus:

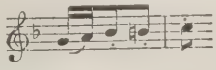
> To say all that is in my heart I have to fly to the language of the Great Republic across the seas: 'Kid, you've spilled a bib-full!'

Music in the Foreign Press

BEETHOVENIANA

In the April Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft, Alfred Lorenz examines Beethoven's sketches for the 'Eroïca,' showing how much these reveal of Beethoven's methods of composition and of his artistic ideals.

The May Zeitschrift für Musik is practically a special Beethoven number. It contains the first instalment of an essay by Dr. Karl Nef on 'Beethoven and Politics,' and an excellent article by F. X. Pauer on Beethoven's final movements, with special reference to the Finale of the second Symphony. Dr. Edmund Richter writes on Johann Vincenz Richter (1788-1853), who was one of the earliest champions of Beethoven's music. And Dr. Alfred Heuss devotes much care to the task of proving that there is one supernumerary bar (the 25th) in the first movement of the 'Pastoral' Symphony; that where we have ten times the motive:



it should occur nine times only—as is the case in the recapitulation.

MAURICE RAVEL

The April issue of the Revue Musicale is a special Ravel number, carefully planned and well carried out. Tristan Klingsor writes on 'Ravel et l'art de son temps,' Roland Manuel on Ravel's æsthetics (which he describes as 'the æsthetics of imposture,' amusingly justifying this curious label). Vuillermoz deals with Ravel's orchestral style, Casella with his harmony, and Gil-Marchex with his pianoforte style. There are other articles by André Cœuroy, Arthur Hoerée, René Chalupt, and Henry Prunières. Excerpts from Ravel's few and scattered writings on music are a welcome feature. The opening article is by André Suarés, and contains gems such as :

> Foreigners are obtuse ; and the French, usually, are neither musicians nor poets.
> If there exists henceforth a French style in music, it is greatly due to Ravel. His orchestra recalls to the mind that of Richard Strauss.

OTHER SPECIAL NUMBERS

The April issue of the Musikblätter des Anbruch is devoted to 'Jazz,' and contains articles by Darius Milhaud, Percy Grainger, Louis Grünberg, Cæsar Saerchinger, and Alexander Jemnitz.

The May issue is devoted to the Prague Music Festival. It contains numerous articles on Czecho-Slovakian music, a survey of the activities of the I.M.S. during the past three years, and special articles on the new works produced at Prague.

The April issue of Melos is devoted to contemporary Russian music. Leonid Sabaneiev, writing on Russian music after 1914, calls attention to the formation of a Judæo-Russian school whose principal representatives are the brothers Krein, Michail Gniessin, and A. Veprik.

Referring to Miaskovsky, Sabaneiev is less enthusiastic than the other Russian critics whose opinions have reached us so far :

> Although Miaskovsky has written eight Symphonies, he is not a born symphonic writer, nor a master of orchestral technique. At times it seems as if he composed carelessly. What we personally miss in his music is individuality. Everywhere we notice the influence of other composers.

Igor Gliebov writes on the immediate future of Russian music. He considers, among other things, that > . . . what Russia needs is a composer like Verdi, whose songs will be sung by all kinds of people, and everywhere, and whose evolution will keep pace with the evolution of his public.

N. Malkov writes on the compositions of Andrei Pashchenko (b. 1883), a pupil of Steinberg and Vihtol.

The April Musica d' Oggi is a special Puccini number.

EARLY PROTESTANT CHURCH MUSIC

In the May Revue de Musicologie, Théodore Gérold describes the first books of Protestant Church music printed at Strasburg, beginning with the 'Teutsch Kirchenampt mit lobgsengen und götlichen Psalmen,' of 1525. He points out that a certain number of old tunes by Strasburg composers—e.g., the setting of Psalm 119 by Matth. Greiter, used by Bach in the 'St. Matthew' Passion, and that of Psalm 137 by Wolfgang Dachstein, incorporated into two of Bach's organ works—are still in use in the Protestant Churches of Germany.

THE INTERNATIONAL MUSIC FESTIVAL, PRAGUE, 1925

BY HUBERT J. FOSS

The first concert—held in a hall which many reports show to be dangerously doubtful for sound—was given on May 15, in the evening, and opened with a tribute to Busoni—his Serenade of 1919. The orchestra—throughout rather disappointing—certainly did not play itself in here. It is a work of very lovely possibilities, without completion or achievement ; masterly in orchestration, but never inevitable. One curiously expected it to stop before it did. The new works were alarmingly disappointing. Ernst Toch's Five Pieces for chamber orchestra represent that barren note-spinning in unplanned counterpoint which is so popular in Europe to-day. They are quite negligible, and, in addition, rather unpleasant ; to see the score is interesting, for here is palpably visual music, charming to look at but arid in sound. The composer has a technical trick of repeating his figures in order to achieve a climax ; this, it seems to me, is a paltry device. Roland Manuel's 'Tempo di Ballo' is an exercise in orchestration ; superficially brilliant, and otherwise unimportant. Of Vittorio Rieti (Suite from the 'Noah's Ark' Ballet), we feel sure he has talent, particularly since he is so young, but—as I had occasion to show recently elsewhere—he is a wag, always cracking his little jokes. Here we had the usual armoury of sudden louds and softs, low notes on bassoon and tuba, silly little tunes subjected to olympic treatment. The fugue is better—well scored at least. I feel no hope for Rieti's future until he is less funny. Alfredo Casella did not show well as a conductor, and the orchestra's rhythm was distinctly weak. The playing of Rudolf Karel's 'Démon,' a symphonic poem of the Straussian kind, was far better under Václav Talich, though the music was hardly worth it. The treatment is better than either the subject-matter or the musical conception, the whole being a very sentimental diabolism and a wailing commendation of Beelzebub, couched in a somewhat grandiose form. Heinrich Kaminski's 'Concerto Grosso,' for double orchestra, is a heavy, serious, pompous work, following Reger rather than Bach, and with the thickest texture imaginable. An interesting study in polyphony, it does not achieve that complete freedom of instrumental treatment that the programme described. It is the palpable failure, of, I think, an interesting mind. The composer could to advantage halve its length, and a little gaiety would give his muse a fresher colour.

There can hardly have been a doubt among the audience at the end of the second concert (Sunday, May 17) that the only complete work of art presented that evening was Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' Symphony. The more I hear it the more am I convinced that this is not only the composer's finest achievement, but the finest work that has been produced in the English revival of music. Played at the end of a long and tiring concert by a weary orchestra to whom the idiom was quite strange, with a scheme of colour-values which had perforce to be high, because the subtlety of the original score could not be produced, it yet had a remarkable effect upon the audience, and was recognised as an important work. To the European musician, it lacks the entrée into modern music—excitement, noise, violence. That is why it so surprised me to find how genuinely, and with what warmth, its delicate meditations were appreciated.

The Partita by Paul Amadeus Pisk is quite delightful, deriving — like everything else from Vienna—from Schönberg, but evolving a really original and consistent harmonic scheme. It is a complete work of a complex but lucid texture, only lightly affected by the academic idealisation of random canon for canon's sake which is so popular now. Also there is displayed a capacity for lyrical melody which is refreshing, and a grandeur that does not depend entirely upon thunderous stridencies. The work tails off a little in the quicker passages, but the ending, on a real common chord—oh, heresy! —retrieves it from failure.

The Six Pieces for full orchestra by György Kósa are also of a moderately high standard. They are, indeed, self-conscious, rather solemn and sentimental, and not far enough away from their subjects—'Seul,' 'Prière Sceptique,' 'Sans Espoir,' &c. Rather obvious in conception, they are yet cleverly treated, and their final effect is of a rather spineless but charming introspection. We are not hopeful of Kósa's being able to carry on the grand tradition of Bartók and Kodláy.

Three entirely negligible works followed. Rudolf Réti's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra was a disgrace to the Festival: it is just such music that makes the unenthusiastic despise these excellent gatherings. The committee cannot have examined what, to me, and to every one else I have spoken to, seemed physically painful rubbish. This is humbug of the first water. Fidelio Finke's super-romantic 'Les Adieux,' for two soloists and orchestra, has all the poorest qualities of the post-Wagnerians—the heavy, odorous yearnings, the necrophilous amorousness of Strauss and the rest. Despite certain moments of beauty, this work is a failure, because its spirit and technique are alike borrowed from too-well-known sources. Bohuslav Martinu's 'Half-Time,' inspired, we are told, by a football match, is not, I fear, very entertaining. We have here the noisy, lashing percussion of Stravinsky and his follower Bliss, but nothing else, and that is not enough. It is too long, too loud, too inherently and brutally stupid to be more than a jeu d'esprit; it has therefore a butterfly's life.

After this queer medley of dissonances, the calm sincerity of the 'Pastoral' was a great relief. Unfortunately the wind was poor, and the hidden voice a little too operatic. On the whole the performance was good, and Mr. Adrian Boult must be congratulated on doing what he did. What a work it is! One could fill many columns with a discussion of its quiet beauty.

The third concert contained a serious disappointment; owing to insufficient time for rehearsal the Symphony for wind instruments of Stravinsky was not played. After the Octet, we were anxious to hear how Stravinsky's development has proceeded.

The piece of the evening was undoubtedly Béla Bartók's 'Suite de Danses'; indeed, one would say it was the achievement of the whole Festival. It is palpably the work of a master, a thing shown as much by the exquisite treatment of the linking Ritornelle as by anything in the work. Violent and primitive in rhythm, it is yet wrought with a beautiful and restrained skill, is original without seeking novelty, full of real expression, has humour, is scored with a certain hand, and produces a definite effect. What else can we ask? It is a magnificent achievement.

On the whole this was the most consistently interesting concert. It opened with Ernst Krenek's 'Concerto Grosso,' which showed his besetting evil of being able to write too easily. Out it all comes, without criticism. The first movement is a ridiculous travesty of Bach; later the classical influence has its effect, and on the whole we find the work very interesting if not quite sufficient. It has little to say; but it says that little well. It is interesting to notice the use here of definite and memorable subjects.

Malipiero's 'Variations without a Theme' is a work of great charm, and no little real beauty. It is perhaps over-reliant upon colour, but it has a definite scheme of treatment which combats this tendency. Its formal scheme is interesting: it consists, as we now expect of Malipiero, of a string of short moods; alas! this is not carried out, and we felt surprised at an abrupt ending.

Vítězslav Novák's 'Toman et la Nymphe' stands by itself apart. It is quite outside the scope of these concerts, cannot be called modern music at all, and is a quite commonplace symphonic poem of the old school. Of Darius Milhaud's 'Fragments Symphoniques du drame "Protée"' only two movements from five were played; one cannot therefore judge it, particularly as the programme-notes applied the word Mendelssohnian to the third. What we heard was more attractive than Milhaud has taught us to expect, although one feels all along the literary basis of the work: that is to say, the music is not self-sufficient in shape. The first movement is lyrical and sweet, well done, and quite big in conception. The Prelude is a rather obvious scherzo, and the Fugue rather noisomely ugly with its random counterpoint.

On the whole this Festival was a disappointment. There stand out in the first class Bartók's Dance Suite and Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' Symphony'; in the second, Malipiero's 'Variations,' Pisk's 'Partita,' Kósa's Six Pieces, and Kaminski's 'Concerto Grosso.'

We must not close without a word of thanks to the very hard-worked Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, and a particular commendation of its very able conductor, Václav Talich.

MUSIC AND LAUGHTER

By HEATHCOTE D. STATHAM

I wonder whether any serious person will ever write a book with some such title as 'Physical Reactions to Musical Stimuli.' If he does he will, I hope—indeed, the book would be incomplete without it—devote a chapter to music and laughter. I shall buy that book, since it will concern me personally, for I find that listening to music provokes me to all degrees of laughter, from a languid smile to an almost suffocating explosiveness that requires the adept use of a pocket handkerchief. This is not, I believe, a singular personal peculiarity: others share it. I know, however, that it is not common to everybody, for at concerts I have often noticed that, at the moments when I am endeavouring to hide a grin, the faces of those around me remain quite stolid and unmoved. This is embarrassing. To appear to be laughing at some killingly funny private joke while a classical piece of music is being played is to appear to be bad-mannered. Moreover it is most difficult to indicate by a wave of the hand to someone who eyes you disapprovingly, that it is the music that is responsible for this lamentable breach of good taste. The only thing, I suppose, is to give up going to concerts; or anyhow to concerts at which Bach is being played, for it is Bach who always proves my undoing. Through a long course of self-control I can stand up, for instance, against all the Beethoven Symphonies almost without a twitch—some of the Scherzos try me severely, but I know the danger-spots by now, and brace myself rigidly to meet them. But with Bach in a lively mood I fail every time. Why this is so I do not know; but so it is. For example, some time ago I went to a Sunday afternoon concert when the Bach-Elgar Fugue was being played. Frankly there is nothing in the atmosphere of Queen's Hall on a Sunday afternoon conducive to laughter; even if there is, one is fortified to resist it at such a time by a lunch of ample proportions. It was therefore in a condition of slight, but quite enjoyable, torpor, that I selected a seat in the gallery above the first violins. Nor did the first two items of the programme do anything to dispossess me of this pleasant lethargy. It was only when the conductor gave two firm beats and the strings in unison banged in with that C to G subject, that I felt an absurd grin take possession of my face. In a few moments I was clutching the railings in front of me in exquisite enjoyment of the joke, releasing my hold only to give my neighbour an occasional dig with my elbow.

I cannot pretend to be able to explain all this. Why Bach in his spirited movements thus affects me I do not know. The fact that he does so is recorded here in the hope that the author of 'Physical Reactions to Musical Stimuli' will turn his scientific mind to the question when he writes that book. Fugues and laughter, merriment and double-counterpoint, some subtle thread links them together—but I must wait for that book to be written.

The above may be styled Illegitimate Laughter at music. I must now briefly touch on Legitimate Laughter at music. And here I confine myself within narrow limits. Laughter at tenors singing top notes or contraltos singing 'shop' ballads, I rule out. It is laughter at music plus personality. It may be legitimate, it is often unavoidable, but it is not precisely the brand of laughter with which I wish to deal. Legitimate laughter at music for my purpose means laughter at some joke that is present in the music alone and is independent of any personal peculiarities in the music's interpreters. Such opportunities for legitimate laughter seem to me to be too infrequent. How often do you hear a ripple from an audience simply because the music says something funny? I have been to many orchestral concerts, but I can remember only three passages in music which raised a laugh. One, of course, was the bassoon phrase in the village band in the 'Pastoral' Symphony; the second was the sound of those adorable sheep baa-ing in the muted brass in 'Don Quixote,' and the third that of an oboe imitating the cock-a-doodle-doo of an early-rising fowl in some composition by an American composer. This last I hardly count, for its value as music was nil. It was merely a bird in an unusual environment. Nor do I count the (to me) unpleasant noises which are to be found in a certain class of ultra-modern music. These may cause merriment in some; others will laugh only in the sense that they grin and bear it; but the wise man, when such music begins, seeks the peace of the refreshment bar. What I want to hear, but never do hear (for the above examples are too short to work the listener up to a condition of unbridled merriment), is something which will make me laugh legitimately with the same abandon as the Bach-Elgar Fugue, or any lively work by Bach, makes me laugh illegitimately. There may be such a work in existence, but if there is I have missed it.* When one considers the number of funny noises that must lie hidden and unused in the modern orchestra it is a matter for wonder that composers will never let us hear them. Take the double-bass, for instance. Do people know that double-basses can produce 'high sounds of singular acuteness and incredible power.' Yet, according to Berlioz, they can, and he gives a detailed description of the methods of producing these sounds. 'If there were need,' he adds, 'to introduce into the orchestra a loud female cry, no instrument could better utter it than double-basses employed in this way.' So far as I know this need has not yet arisen, and I rather hope it never will; all the same, I do not think these rich upper tones should be for ever denied to our patient audiences. Think of the delicious shock, the sheer dramatic thrill that would result if, after a strenuous climax and a sudden pause, these majestic instruments were to 'usher in' (quaint phrase) a melody in 'high sounds of singular acuteness and incredible power.'

I plead, then, for the comic in music. Had I a mandate to represent the faithful (which I have not), I should say that what we Promenaders want is something to tickle us, to dig us in the ribs and make the tears run down our cheeks. If brilliant Dr. A or remarkable Mr. B would, instead of writing a gloomy tone-poem or a hair-raising experiment in parallel streams of harmony, write a really funny fugato with plenty of snappy interludes for, say two bassoons, one horn, a muted trumpet, and a xylophone (with an occasional 'sound of singular acuteness and incredible power'), we would applaud it so immoderately that it would be performed quite often instead of being put back almost immediately, like the tone-poem or the experiment, into Dr. A's writing-desk or Mr. B's suit-case. Consider, Dr. A, picture to yourself, Mr. B, the triumph that awaits you when that comic fugue is played. Those witty sallies from the bassoons, those indescribable bubblings of enjoyment from the horn, that pretty give and take between the xylophone and muted trumpet, that ringing challenge from the double-basses soaring high above this peculiar turmoil—who will be able to resist them?

Forget your tone-poems or tear them up; hum your experiments forthwith. Then, on one of these long, amusing winter evenings when the children are in bed, when the fire is crackling on the hearth, and Mrs. A (or Mrs. B) is sitting before it darning, when your pipe is drawing, when, in short, you feel so comfortable, contented, and happy that inspiration seems but a hair's-breadth away, draw towards you one of those immense sheets of music-paper, head it carefully and neatly —and begin.

* I have seen the score of one, but have not heard the work. This is Bliss's 'Committee Meeting' for string quartet, the first number in his 'Conversations.' It is riotously funny.

NEW LIGHT ON LATE TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

IX.—GEORGE BRUSTER

The name of Bruster—also written Brusser and Brewster—may be unfamiliar to music-students of to-day, but it occurs in several MS. music collections ranging from 1575 to 1581. In the Christ Church Part-Books, said to be in the handwriting of John Baldwin, dated 1581 (consisting of five volumes containing more than a hundred compositions) there is a beautiful 'In Nomine' in five parts by Bruster, in addition to pieces by Aston, Byrd, Whyte, Parsons, Tallis, Tye, Farrant, Baldwin, Mallory, Shepherd, Taylor, and Woodcock. The Music School at Oxford possesses a set of vellum-bound part-books containing forty 'In Nomines,' including one by Bruster.

Yet there has been no biographical sketch of Bruster available up to the present. No doubt it has been surmised that his creative period was in the second half of the 16th century, probably based on the fact that a quite remarkable 'In Nomine' of his, arranged for four viols in parts, is to be found in a MS. of the year 1578 (Add. MSS. 31,390), to which the name of 'Brewster' is affixed. There is also, in the British Museum, among the Add. MSS. 32,377, an arrangement of Bruster's five-part 'In Nomine' for string quintet, of which only the treble viol part has survived. The MS. in which this is found is tentatively dated 1584, while in the printed catalogue, vol. iii., the Christian name of the composer is given as '(?) Maurice,' instead of George.

George Bruster, of the parish of St. Saviour's, Southwark, was born about the year 1545, and being endowed with ample means, was enabled to indulge his musical hobby by availing himself of the tuition of the best masters. In 1580 he came under suspicion as a Catholic recusant, and in 1582 ('twenty-fourth year of Elizabeth') was committed to prison for a term of eleven months, as was also Lady Mary Vaux. In 1583 he was again committed to prison for a similar term, 'for not resorting to the Church according to the Statutes.' Not long after, as we learn from the Loseley MSS., Bruster's goods 'were seized and sold to her Majesty's use.'

Bruster was tried at Guildford, on March 20, $158\frac{2}{3}$, and is described as 'George Bruster of St. Saviour's, generosus.' Some of those indicted on this occasion conformed, and were released, but the others were committed to prison, including our composer, who, however, was shortly after released on bail (Loseley MSS., vol. v.).

In a return of 1585 the following significant entry occurs: 'George Beawsley, gent, alias Beasley, still in prison.' However, Sir William More's 'List of Prisoners' at that date adds: 'George Beawsley not known, but one George Brewster was delivered and is dead.' In a contemporary list of recusants of the county of Surrey, under the heading of: 'As are either dead or not now remaining in this county,' Sir William More has the following note: 'George Bewsley, gent, not known, but one George Brewster delivered out of the gaol and now dead' (Loseley MSS., vol. v., Nos. 28 and 29). In a list of Recusants in co. Surrey 'remaining at liberty' in 1592 appears the name of 'George Brewster of St. Saviour's in Southwark' (Hatfield Papers, IV. 271).

Thus we can safely conclude that this amateur composer suffered as a confessor for his recusancy, and was only allowed out of gaol a few weeks before he died—his goods having previously been sequestrated and sold. The exact date of his death is not known, but it most probably occurred in the spring of 1593, or earlier.

His works show sound musicianship, and he deserves to be remembered in the ranks of distinguished amateurs who in the last quarter of the 16th century cultivated successfully the divine art—amateurs of European fame like Thomas Copley, Francis Tregian, and Dr. Thomas Campion.

CÉSAR FRANCK AND HIS OPUS 1 IN ENGLAND

By ANDREW DE TERNANT

It is generally understood that César Franck, as a composer, was first introduced to London concert audiences by his choral and symphonic works written during his maturity. In reality, however, he was introduced to a London audience by the first portion of his Opus 1, nearly sixty years ago. H. F. Chorley, in the Athenæum, June 1, 1867, says:

> When writing of the concert of Mr. Walter Bache we ought to have mentioned a Pianoforte Trio in F sharp minor by M. César Augustus Franck—a work on the verge of musical sanity, but containing grand thoughts, in the last movement especially; further, remarkable as a first opus. We will not say how many years have passed since M. Liszt (then no Abbé) played it for us at Paris, and promised a noble future for its composer. It is a pity that so great a beginning, allowing for some bewilderment, should have had no sequel. The name of the composer has slipped out of the ranks of those of whom, having already done so much, so much was to be expected.

César Franck's Op. 1, it is well-known, consists of the three Trios for pianoforte and strings (F sharp, B flat, and B minor), and dates from the year 1842, when the composer was twenty years of age. The set was composed a few weeks after he left the Paris Conservatoire of Music voluntarily (or, rather, by order of his father, for financial reasons), in April, 1842. The parts were copied out by his father and his brother Joseph, and during the period of César's stay (1842-44) in Belgium, the three Trios were occasionally performed at private soirées musicales. The first of the three was generally considered the best, and the composer agreed with his critics. The set was subsequently published, 'Paris, Chez l'Auteur.' The Liszt performance alluded to by H. F. Chorley, Franck often said, took place in March, 1847, at the house of Madame Pauline Viardot, the great opera singer, and among the notabilities present were the Comte Armand de Pontmartin, the celebrated literary critic, Alexandre Dumas, the famous novelist, Prince Bernard of Saxe-Weimar, and a secretary from the British Embassy at Paris.

The Walter Bache 'annual morning concert' was held at Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday, May 22, 1867. The only survivor among the artists is the now veteran Mr. Francesco Berger, who was the accompanist for the singers. Franck's Trio for pianoforte and strings seems to have attracted very little attention among London musical critics, and the composer and his work are not even mentioned in Constance Bache's 'Brother Musicians (Edward and Walter Bache),' published in 1901. In fact the Athenæum notice appears to be the only record of importance in the London press. The year 1867 was, of course, the period of the last International Exhibition at Paris under the patronage of the Emperor Napoleon III. Walter Bache arrived in the French capital at the end of July; he called on César Franck at his flat, and presented him with a programme of his concert at Hanover Square Rooms. The Franco-Belgian composer was until then unaware of the fact that his Trio in F sharp minor had been performed in London. Walter Bache asked several questions about his 'future compositions,' but Franck replied that he had not composed anything of importance for more than seventeen years. His re-animation as a composer, Franck always told his friends and acquaintances, dated from the Franco-German war, when the invasion of the enemy forced upon him and his fellow professional musicians in France more leisure than was profitable. In the year 1867, Franck was seeking to enlarge his teaching connection, and had an idea of starting a 'School of Ecclesiastical Music' in conjunction with his brother Joseph. It was Joseph who first suggested the idea, and it was Joseph who backed out of it on the excuse of expense. Joseph, who was two years older than César, was not unlike Ebenezer Prout in appearance and manners. For professional purposes he slightly altered the spelling of his surname, and was long known at Paris as 'Joseph Frank, de Liége.' He was in the early 'sixties evidently better known in Belgium than his now more famous brother, and was specially selected to compose a 'Cantate à quatre personnages avec grand orchestre, à l'occasion du mariage de la Princesse Charlotte de Belgique avec l'Archiduc Maximillien d'Autriche.' This secured for Joseph the decorations of 'Chevalier' from the King of the Belgians and the Emperor of Austria. Some of Joseph's published compositions deserve resurrection, especially the 'Six Recueils de Petits Morceaux pour Orgue ou Harmonium,' which contain pieces with the following titles: 'Les Bergers à la Crèche,' 'Les Délices du Sanctuaire,' 'Une Couronne à Marie,' 'L'Encens du Parvis,' 'Fleurs et Prières,' 'Une Heure d'Adoration,' and 'La Lyre Céleste.' He also undertook 'Deux Recueils de Préludes et Fugues de J. S. Bach, transcrits et réduits pour Harmonium.' This had a good sale, and was the means of making better known among the slightly musical amateurs of France and Belgium the masterpieces of the great Sebastian.

César Franck never met Walter Bache again after the visit of the last-named to Paris in 1867. In 1877, Franck was in London during the month of August, but the English champion of Liszt was 'on the Continent.' Franck succeeded after some difficulty in locating the Hanover Square Rooms, only to find they were no longer devoted to the public performance of music. The old-fashioned exterior made it difficult for him to believe that such a place could ever have been a public hall, though he had read that Talma, the great French actor, had made his first appearance on any stage within its walls, near the end of the 18th century. He also consoled himself with the thought that 'César Franck made his first appearance as a composer in England at Hanover Square Rooms.'

Franck often said that though for a long time afterwards he could not help feeling proud of showing the London concert programme to his pupils, friends, and acquaintances, he never made any attempt to push his compositions in England, either by publication or by performance. He had often been told by French, Belgian, and German musicians that it was impossible for a foreigner to make any headway in English musical life unless he had what is known as a 'Continental reputation,' and as Franck had little reputation in his native Belgium or his adopted France, this more than strengthened his resolution not to make an effort. But it did not prevent him from being a great admirer of England and her institutions. His earliest recollections of novel reading were translations of those of Defoe, Fielding, and Walter Scott; and the works of Charles Dickens were the solace of his old age. Franck was not ignorant of Tallis, Byrd, Purcell, and the English Cathedral composers, and confessed that he was first drawn to a study of their works through the constant perusal of the monumental 'Biographie Universelle des Musiciens' of a fellow Belgian, François Joseph Fétis. The young English musicians who visited him in his organ-loft at St. Clotilde also showed that they were quite as capable of upholding the musical dignity of their native land as were any other young men of similar ages in France, Belgium, and Germany.

New Music

SONGS

There is generally trouble when composers fall in love with poems that are already happily married. Comparison is in a way shallow and obvious, yet it is inevitable, for the mind does it before the conscience can utter a protest. A new setting, when there is already a good one, if it is to be of value must not only be good in itself; it must also throw new light on its poem, and be the outcome of a new, vivid, and intensely personal realisation. M. van Someren Godfery, for instance, has set Rossetti's 'Silent Noon' (Elkin), and though we try to avoid it, it is impossible not to see that this song is not sufficiently personal to stand apart. It is obviously sincere and good in some ways, but it does not see the poem in any new light or more intensely, and in several points of style it frankly suggests the influence of Vaughan Williams, with whose setting it is therefore bound to be unfavourably compared. The same composer's 'Birthright' is not up to the standard of 'Silent Noon.' Both in vocal line and harmonic plan it is inclined to be wandering and aimless, and consequently unsatisfactory, for music that wants to achieve an aimless and wandering effect must be of all music the most consciously controlled. Two songs by Cyril Scott, 'Mist' and 'The Ballad of Fair Helen,' and one by Clive Carey, 'Rondel,' also come from Elkins. 'Mist,' one can guess: we have all learnt to do it now, and some have learnt not to do it—but here the thing is so uncritically overdone that it really seems as if the composer were parodying himself. 'The Ballad of Fair Helen' is less obvious, but the composer's style is little suited to the starkness of the ballad. The song might be made dramatic by an able singer, but personally I so heartily dislike the way Mr. Scott gets his effects nowadays (what some composers call, in reference to the look of the music on the page, the 'grog-blossom style') that I cannot 'away with it' at all. Probably many admirers of Scott's work will like these songs. 'Rondel' is a frankly light affair, saved from being commonplace by fanciful touches. It has gaiety, a fine, free vocal line, and a skilful accompaniment. Difficult to sing, it is, however, well and vocally written, and will be a good study for certain kinds of technique.

Curwens send several songs, among them another good one by Arthur Benjamin. 'Calm sea and mist' is small in scope, but within its limits extremely well done. Especially happy is its accompaniment figure, with its suggestion of the 'Slow heave of the sleeping sea.' There is at letter C, however, a phrase which is vocally awkward to manage, and whose effect, when achieved, seems a poor reward. It is unfortunate that the one weak moment in a good song should come at a crucial point. Frances Toye's 'The Inn' is a bold venture, for there could hardly be words more difficult to set than Belloc's whirling and giddy poem. The composer has made a good job of it, however, with an accompaniment full of suggestive touches, and a very effective sudden change of mood at the end. Many of us, perhaps, will still prefer to read this poem without music, so as to feel more fully its own rapid and intoxicating sound, which additional music, unavoidably, somewhat kills : for others who want music added to it, this setting is good. Two simpler songs, in widely differing styles, are 'The Liverpool Girls,' a shanty collected and arranged by Clive Carey, and 'Russian Lullaby,' by E. d'Arba. Both are good. Two songs by Helmer Norén, also from Curwens, seem, on the other hand, over-conscious of their modernness. The second, 'The year's at the spring,' consists of a commonplace little tune tricked out with harmonies that go out of their way to be hideously ugly and irritatingly affected. And when there are no painful noises to distract the attention, the music is plainly seen to be empty and meaningless. The first song, 'Alone,' achieves a certain atmospheric effect by the rather easy means of a drone bass, but on the whole these songs seem very much below the general level of the edition in which they appear. From the Oxford University Press comes 'With rue my heart is laden,' by C. W. Orr. This song has a simple diatonic tune for which the accompaniment seems at first sight too heavy both in colour and texture. But after a time one finds out which notes to repress and which to encourage, and things begin to fall into place : the song will always need a fine accompanist, therefore, to be successful. But given the right people it will be impressive, for the end of it, particularly, is beautiful in a quiet, distinguished, and moving way.

Winthrop Rogers re-issue two songs by Benjamin Whelpley, 'The nightingale has a lyre of gold' and 'Oh ! for a breath of the moorlands'; and one by Frederic Bullard, 'The Sword of Ferrara,' all of which were copyright about twenty years ago by Schirmer. The last is of the melodramatic 'Dead is all glory, dead all fame' type; the first two are of a more conventionally sentimental kind. In each case the music is so commonplace, and 'dates' so fatally that it is difficult to see why these songs should have been chosen for exhumation. Gluck's 'Let a noble courage,' from 'Iphigenia,' on the other hand, is welcome in Novello's re-issue, for it has all the plain, solid qualities of line and balance which make for survival so much more than does mere colour. A good soprano might make it finely effective. Vaarlem's Ballad from 'Boris,' issued in song form by Chesters, has vivid colour, and a plain strength of tune and rhythm as well. It calls for a high, dramatic baritone and a fine pianist, and is worth all they can give it, for it has great vigour, and even if the whole thing is barbaric, it is tremendously exhilarating. This translation, by M. C. H. Collet, fits the music well, and is a sound piece of English, free from the absurdities which are often tolerated in song-translations. Another re-issue is that by Winthrop Rogers of 'Ten Negro Spirituals' arranged by various hands. They are already fairly well-known, but those who want them will be glad to have them at a reasonable price for the ten, rather than singly at a pretty exorbitant figure. The accompaniments here seem more restrained than some have been, but they are still effective. The trouble with these things is that the juiciness which often offends is almost essential to them. They seem to thrive on a rich and fruity atmosphere; a more refined one gives them no support, and is useless.

From Enochs come a handful of old-fashioned ballads : 'A Kentucky Melody,' by Robert Coverley; 'Cretan Cradle Song,' by J. Backer Lunde; 'When I'm home again,' by Daniel Wood; 'Loveday,' by G. O'Connor Morris; 'The Fighting Chance,' by Frank Lambert; and 'The Lover,' by Easthope Martin. All are pretty commonplace, but in ballads the hearty is generally to be preferred to the sentimental, so one chooses the last two. 'Loveday' has some charm, but is hardly worthy of its composer. May Brahe's 'From the Nursery Window' (also from Enochs) is a set of six children's songs, with silhouettes by L. N. Hummel. It is simple, tuneful, and unpretentious, and Miss (or Mr.) Hummel's decorations help to make the little volume attractive.

Granville Bantock's 'The Enchanted Wood' (Joseph Williams) is, needless to say, fluently written; but, despite its facility—or perhaps because of it—it does not carry conviction. The interest is chiefly in the pianoforte part, and if this were well played the song would have a certain charm, but it will never be a very considerable work, however well it may be done.

Phyllis M. James's 'Contrasts' (Murdoch) are thoughtful, but do not come off as well as we feel they ought to, for there is in both of them a certain indecision about tonality which makes them, in spite of their good points, unsatisfying. Felix White's two songs, 'The Far Farers' and 'The Flower-Girl' (Boston Music Co.), are much more surely handled. 'The Far Farers,' however, just misses being a really fine song because the chief accompaniment figure, which is used throughout the work, has not the note of distinction that is expected from this composer. It is, in fact, almost commonplace, and pulls down the level of the song. 'The Flower Girl,' on the other hand, is entirely successful, perhaps because it attempts less. It is lighter, and full of charming and musicianly touches, in a style that particularly well suits Felix White.

From Durand of Paris come 'Le Secret' and 'Quatre Ballades de Paul Fort,' by Phillipe Gaubert, together with 'Deux Sonnets' and 'Viens ! une flûte invisible soupire,' by André Caplet. Phillipe Gaubert's music suffers from overmuch of the tonal scale, which has become hackneyed; but the four Ballades, which are songs of the sea, have a rhythmic energy that to some extent neutralises the devitalising tonal harmonies, which are, in any case, less in evidence here.

The last song of the set, 'Le ciel est gai,' is a fine thing, offering great opportunities alike to pianist and singer; and there are two other very good numbers, so that the volume is one not to be overlooked. One or two passages suggest the influence of Vaughan Williams, and it is noticeable that this second volume is far freer, and more interesting generally, than the composer's more conventionally French 'Le Secret.' The French composers of to-day might learn a good deal from the best of our English music; and there are signs that Vaughan Williams's influence is being a good deal felt in France, so perhaps this is an example of its wholesome effect.

André Caplet's songs make us understand what a loss to French music his recent death was, for though he was little known in England, everything that we see of his bears the marks of a definite and charming, even if not great, personality. 'Viens, une flûte invisible soupire,' is a typically charming song, perhaps something of a studio-work, but not without individuality. It is written for contralto voice, with pianoforte, and an obbligato flute part. The 'Deux Sonnets,' twenty years later, show his style more fully developed, but on lines clearly foreshadowed in the earlier work. These songs are for soprano and harp: the first of them, a beautiful expression of home-sickness, sincere and not over-sentimental, is well-suited to the pianoforte; the second, though possible with a good pianist, is essentially harp music. This last song is much more rarefied and elusive stuff than the earlier one, but is full of beauty and delicacy, and well worth study. Caplet's music reminds us that Massenet, at his best, had a greater influence on French music than is generally remembered. He comes very close to Caplet's early song, just as he does to early Debussy, and, though less markedly, to Ravel. His stock is low at present, but it is safe to predict a sharp rise before very long.

ORGAN MUSIC

The recent output of organ music takes cognisance of the Tercentenary of Orlando Gibbons. As Gibbons, like his contemporaries, wrote some of his keyboard pieces with both organ and virginal in mind, and as the organ of the period had no pedal board, only a small proportion of his work is of much practical use to the organist of to-day. Moreover, instrumental forms and the keyboard idiom were in a primitive state, and a good deal of writing that was advanced for its time is now merely puerile. But Gibbons was so great a man that his quality was bound to show itself at times despite these drawbacks. The 'Fantazia of Foure Parts' from 'Parthenia,' has always been held up as one of the finest keyboard works of the period, and there will be few to disagree with Mr. Fuller-Maitland's pronouncement as to its being 'so masterly in design, so finely invented, and so splendidly carried out, that we meet with nothing at all comparable to it until the time of Bach.'

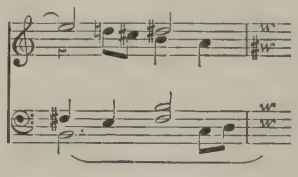
So grave and spacious a piece is well suited to the organ, and it was a happy thought of John E. West to make an arrangement for that instrument (Novello). No editor of organ music is more practical and helpful than Mr. West, and this version is marked by his usual thoughtfulness for the player. The construction of the work is shown by a numbering of the six themes, and their exact duration is indicated by brackets. Simple and practical are the registration marks, and there is some excellent phrasing. Particularly good is the treatment of the fifth section, which, without his suggested staccato treatment of the last two notes of the theme, is apt to become rather tame. The two closing sections, by the way, make a capital study in phrasing and independence. Despite a few archaisms and crudities this noble old piece is well worth playing—more so, we venture to suggest, than certain of Bach's early and immature works that retain their vogue only by virtue of his name.

Chesters have just issued an album of Ten Pieces by Gibbons, drawn from the Virginal Book of Benjamin Cosyn, edited by Mr. Fuller-Maitland, and arranged for modern organ. The arranger has limited himself to the laying out of the music for pedals and manuals, and to a few indications as to changing of manuals. More phrasing marks would have been welcome. Some of the pieces are already known to a few organists—e.g., the 'Cornet Voluntary' and the 'Fancy for Double Organ.' Though unequal in interest, the collection should be welcome. Much of the music would be excellent for the study of polyphonic playing of moderate difficulty.

The complete keyboard works of Gibbons have just been published by Stainer & Bell in five volumes, transcribed and edited from the MSS. by Margaret H. Glyn. Vols. 4 & 5 contain pieces either definitely written for organ or suitable to the instrument, and so are mentioned in this review. Miss Glyn adopts the crotchet as the unit—a good move, as we constantly hear the music of this period sung and played at far too slow a rate, owing to the conventional array of minims and semibreves. No suggestions are made as to the pedal part, on the ground that 'there was no pedal board in Tudor organs, and the Fancies are here given as originally written for manuals only.' The only advantage in thus leaving the pieces on two staves is that the pianist may easily play them. Miss Glyn includes among the organ pieces the 'Fantazia of Foure Parts,' and a comparison with the version of Mr. West's arrangement is instructive. It shows how much a skilful (but not fussy) editor may do to enhance the effect of quasi-obsolete music.

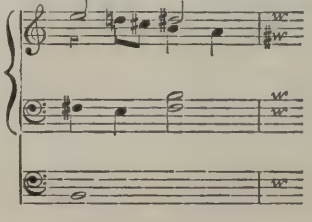
There is a misprint at bar 13 on page 5, the first F surely requiring a sharp. And I cannot believe that this bar, from page 7, is what Gibbons intended (with or without the bass C and D sharpened):

Ex. 1.



Mr. West gives the passage as it appears in 'Parthenia,' thus:

Ex. 2.



There is no question as to the gain in effect when the Fantazia is played with a well-disposed pedal part, and the same remark applies more or less to the rest of the collection. It is good to have the whole of Gibbons's organ music available; inevitably the bulk of it is mainly of antiquarian interest, but occasionally amidst the puerilities we come across a page too good to lose. Such survivals deserve to be kept in the répertoire. Their gravity and simplicity make them admirable for use as voluntaries.

Marcel Dupré's 'Cortège et Litanie' (Leduc) opens with a simple theme of religious character, well laid out. A second subject in semiquavers, pp, is treated as an Ostinato in the manuals, the two themes being then combined and worked up to an imposing close. The idea of the piece is the gradual approach of a procession. It is fairly difficult, and altogether more practicable for the average player than most of Dupré's works.

Leo Sowerby's 'Prelude on the Benediction' ('Ite Missa Est') is an ambitious piece, fourteen pages in length (Boston Music Co.; Winthrop Rogers). It treats the little plainsong theme with a good deal of resource and effect. Mr. Sowerby is not afraid of dissonance, but his occasional daring is always justified. He writes admirable polyphony, slightly on the craggy side, and of a type that evokes an atmosphere. A touch of austerity is in the picture. The Prelude calls for a good player, and an organ of ample resource. The American school of organ music so far seems to be notable for quantity rather than quality, but Mr. Sowerby is one of the few composers who lead us to expect great things of it. He has a fine feeling for colour, is original without being eccentric, and is not unduly concerned with pleasing the gallery. He should go far.

Godfrey Sceats's 'Four Versets on "Salve, festa dies"' (Cramer) shows French influence in its title and harmony, and there is a reminder of Karg-Elert in its use of the theme as a basis for an Ostinato, a Saraband, a Scherzo, and an Alla Marcia. There are some very effective moments in all except the second piece. The harmony is mainly modal, with a few modern splashes by way of relief. Mr. Sceats is a little too fond of consecutive sixths, and his laying-out is not always happy—e.g., some of the passages in the last movement might easily have been made more comfortable for the player and more sonorous in effect. But the composer shows a real knack for this free treatment of plainsong—a department of organ music too little exploited by English composers. Organists at churches where the 'Salve' is sung to its ancient melodies will find these pieces useful to play when a two- or three-minutes' interlude is called for before or after the procession, or at the close of a service at which the hymn has been sung.

Alec Rowley's 'Rustic Suite' (Paxton) consists of five short pieces, all attractive, but a little over-facile. They are better suited for recital purposes than for voluntaries. Cinema organists who want light, tuneful works, original rather than arrangements, will find the Suite useful. It is quite easy.

Paxton's issue also a good arrangement, by J. Stuart Archer, of the Scots tune 'The Flowers of the Forest'; an easy and effective version from the same practised hand of the 'Hindoo Song' from 'Sadko'; and a very unoriginal and saccharine piece by Cyril Jenkins, called 'Dawn.'

PIANOFORTE

All composers must learn their language from somebody, and it would be unreasonable to expect them to come to maturity in a day. Nor does anybody want them to strive after originality for its own sake, or consciously eliminate from their music all that suggests the influence of others: for too many composers in cutting out all that was borrowed have cut out all that was interesting. But at the same time it is true that all those composers who were going ultimately to arrive have made felt, even in their dependent days, something of themselves. The first Sonata of Beethoven, for all its debt to them, stands as clear of Mozart and Haydn as the early Brahms Sonatas do of Beethoven's late ones. There is, however, another kind of immature work which, while it shows the sensitiveness and receptivity of its composers, has no deep or personal feeling of its own at all; and to this class Laurence Powell's 'Phacelia' (Op. 17) seems to belong. The first and last sections of this piece come from Scriabin, the middle section suggests Ireland, and introduced into the middle of this mixture is a snatch of modal tune, coming from yet another source. The result is that the piece has no unity of style, no continuous growth, no individuality, and, however attractive some bars of it may be, as a whole it has little interest. Roy Agnew's 'Pangbourne Fields' has much more homogeneity of style, but even here a short length of modal stuff is sewn, not very securely, into a garment made of frankly Scriabinesque material. Consecutive ninths, too, rising by semitones to a climax, have borne the burden and heat of a long day, and should be allowed rest. It's a pity, one can't help feeling, that composers of promise and serious purpose should publish works that cannot, after all, be much more than the exercises by which they hope to develop their talents. Thomas F. Dunhill is not in this boat. His 'White Peacocks' shows firmness of grip and plenty of technical control. It is a sort of stately dance calling for delicate treatment by the player, which it is not easy to give in some parts, on account of the thickness of the texture. Rather conscious avoidance of the commonplace produces now and again something like affectation, but the interest may hold out if this item is well played, for it has more rhythmical vitality than the others. All these pieces are published by Curwen.

With Chaminade we are on different ground. Enochs issue a four-hand arrangement of her Interlude in D, Op. 152, first published in 1914. It is absolutely unaffected, frankly light music; but it shows a real gift and is sincere. After a lot of rather disingenuous things, it is good to find something that knows itself, and does not try to appear more than it very effectively is. Chaminade's music may be trying to live with, but it is amusing to meet for a few minutes. What a pity it is that composers do not realise, as a rule, what a place there is in music for really good, light stuff—stuff like the best of Rossini and Thomas and Sullivan and German. From the same publishers is 'Saturday in Town,' by Charles Wakefield Cadman. This is a set of ten pieces for children, prefaced with poems by Nelle Richmond Eberhart, and describing 'how Donald and Constance [afterwards abbreviated for purposes of rhyme to Don and Con] spent the day.' Not all the pieces are descriptive, and on the whole the non-descriptive ones, such as the Gavotte, are the best. The use of labels in the music is a rather cheap way of explaining, if not excusing, some pretty weak stuff. No pains are spared to make the volume attractive and interesting to children, but the allotment is unfair. More should have been spent on the musical part of it. Theodore Lack's 'Menuet Hongrois,' his Op. 275, is from the same publishers. It is a business-like little work, and will provide teachers with some useful points of phrasing, form, and technique. Most of the composer's inspiration, however, seems to have been spent on the other two hundred and seventy-four works. Nicolas d'Averil's 'On Sussex Downs' (Elkin) also contains some useful teaching pieces: the simpler examples will be the most welcome, for one feels about the more difficult numbers that people with as much technique as that ought to be living on stronger meat.

From Curwen's comes a novelty in the shape of a wordless play, 'Bluebeard,' the music by M. E. Marshall, the action by M. C. McConnel and H. R. Campbell. This is a small ballet, for three characters, which will be thoroughly welcome in schools, or anywhere where there are children, a pianoforte, and a pianist. The music is good, and in a simple way cleverly depicts the action of the story, which, though there are three short set-dances, as a rule goes along pretty quickly. It is likely that some of the subtler points, such as the musical description of the three keys and their purposes, are not quite well enough done to 'get over,' except to an audience very carefully prepared; but in its main points the play should be extremely amusing and effective. The climax is well worked-up and exciting, although at the end Bluebeard might have been allowed a little longer for himself and his knocking to die away. He has been very considerate in the whole matter of dying, and it seems ungrateful to hurry him. The whole thing, however, is so much in the nature of a very good-humoured joke that it disarms criticism. T. A.

CHAMBER MUSIC

It is gratifying to see composers giving their attention to the string orchestra. A demand for such music is bound to grow with the expansion of the competitive festival. The string orchestra is not only the basis of the full orchestra; even if ideal conditions should prevail, and every festival had well-patronised competitions for full orchestra, the strings must always have a class to themselves. Two compositions we have received fulfil the necessary conditions for such a class—Cyril B. Rootham's 'Miniature Suite' for string orchestra and pianoforte (Curwen), and Peter Warlock's 'Serenade' for strings (Oxford University Press). Rootham's work is simple and pleasing in its way; the string writing is somewhat close, and the first fiddle need never go higher than the third position. It consists of four movements, the third of which is in 5-4 time and should provide capital practice for the apprentice. Peter Warlock's Serenade, dedicated 'To Frederick Delius on his sixtieth birthday,' is more ambitious and more interesting. The parts are balanced to a nicety, and only the skilled player could bring out effectively their latent poetry.

Arthur Benjamin's 'Three Impressions' for voice and string quartet belong, presumably, to the chamber music genre. They are settings of poems by William Sharp, and the composer has been at pains to reproduce in two of these the atmosphere conjured up by the words—the stillness of a winter's day in 'Hedgerow,' the slow heaving of the sea in 'Calm Sea and Mist.' The third, 'The Wasp,' buzzes its way along to some purpose, but surely Allegro (♩ = 120) is a little too brisk for a 'hot and drowsy' autumn song. At such speed a glissando trill covering in a quaver's time the distance between B and F on the D string, can hardly be effective. B. V.

VIOLIN MUSIC

Messrs. Joseph Williams have published the first sixteen volumes (Series 2) of their Library of Classics for the violin with pianoforte accompaniment, arranged and fingered by Spencer Dyke. I have not been able to discover the criteria ruling the choice of music or its grouping. In the pieces of this second series, Nos. 1 and 16 are moderately difficult; but Nos. 6 and 7 are easy, while No. 10 is difficult; they are not arranged according to the skill they demand of the player. As regards choice, it ranges from pure violin music, like Raff's Cavatina, to the inevitably unsatisfactory adaptation of typical pianoforte music, like the Adagio from the 'Moonlight' Sonata and Weber's 'Invitation to the Dance.'

The 'Caprice' for violin and orchestra of Louis Aubert (Durand) is far less capricious than its title and its nationality would suggest. Modern French music—good, bad, or indifferent as it may be—invariably tends towards iconoclasm. Aubert, however, appears content with much less than the complete destruction of all that the past held dear. There is a sprinkling of harmony of the common, modern type and, of course, the melodic part of the violin has nothing in the nature of a sustained effusion. Violins nowadays are expected to do most things—scream, laugh, groan—but not to sing. And possibly the desperate vibrato of certain players represents the unconscious protest of the violinist debarred from his most natural expression. But if Aubert shows here and there that he has studied up-to-date methods, he is nevertheless strangely reticent for a Frenchman, and I fear some of his countrymen will put him down as a rank conservative. B. V.

'CELLO MUSIC

Alexandre Tcherepnin can be relied upon to turn out an article of a certain distinction of style, and the 'Ode' for 'cello and pianoforte (Durand) is no exception to the general rule of his work. If he does not rise to great heights, he also never falls below a very respectable level. Moreover, his intentions are invariably clear. We know what he is aiming at, and even in a short piece like the 'Ode' this directness adds much to the pleasure of the reader. Tcherepnin's idiom has its limitations, but it unquestionably represents an individuality which, if not very striking, as far as we know it, is nevertheless distinct, and above all, essentially musical. B. V.

HARP MUSIC

Messrs. Durand have published two new 'Divertissements' for the harp—à la française; à l'espagnole—by André Caplet. Both are distinctly original in outlook and workmanship. They give no clear indication of the speed at which they are to be played, the composer merely suggesting that the first is something to be performed Bien allègrement et carré, and the second Avec galbe et très drapé. It is all chaste merriment in à la française and distinctly sober grace in à l'espagnole, which perhaps suggests the existence of a district near Paris concerned with Spanish as Stratford-atte-Bowe was concerned with French. It is also rather vague, experimental, and interesting —not beautiful or particularly pleasant. B. V.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Richard Wagner.' A Critical Biography. By George Ainslie Hight. 2 vols.
[Arrowsmith, 52*s.* 6*d.*]

A new life of Wagner needs strong justification in these days, and such justification it is not too easy to find in these portly volumes which Mr. George Ainslie Hight has added to the already overwhelming mass of Wagnerian literature. In many respects, no doubt, the author is well enough qualified for his task. He has knowledge of his subject, he has enthusiasm, he writes agreeably, and so on. But these things of themselves are not enough. The only new biography of Wagner for which there is any real warrant to-day is one which either (1) tells the story as we know it already better than it has been told before, or (2) tells it with the addition of new facts and better understanding, resulting from the discovery of fresh information. And Mr. Hight's work cannot be said to comply with either of these conditions.

He himself expressly disclaims any thought of bringing to light new facts :

> The following pages contain no new contribution to the known facts of Wagner's life. In the opinion of the author we already know far more than is either needful or edifying.

And the work is, in point of fact, not in any way remarkable for the fullness or completeness of its information. On the contrary it is noticeably lacking in this respect—taking for granted all sorts of things, or merely touching on them in passing, which should be treated at length and in detail in any biography aiming at completeness. Still, in view of the disclaimer quoted, the author need not be blamed on this score.

But then what raison d'être for the work remains ? Mr. Hight explains his main purpose—though oddly enough only on the detachable paper 'jacket' of the volumes—as follows :

> This book has been written largely to refute the unworthy misrepresentations of Wagner's private character in the English press. Yet while the author does not conceal his judgment of the Meister as one of the greatest figures in the art of any epoch, he has not abstained from trenchant criticism when it appeared necessary.

And this purpose if satisfactorily carried out might well be quite sufficient justification for the work. Counsel for the prosecution have been sufficiently vocal for some years past, and a really good statement of the case for the defence would be well worth having.

But here we find ourselves pulled up at once by the author's explanation of the curious principles upon which he has gone to work. His statements on the subjects are indeed hopelessly contradictory and bewildering—for, while on the cover he makes the bold declaration above quoted, in his Introduction he says :

> The outlines of Wagner's life are related, but without any attempt to follow it into minuter detail than is necessary to enable the reader to understand the circumstances under which his works were composed.

Here is surely a fundamental divergence of aims. To concentrate on Wagner the artist and to limit your biographical matter accordingly is one thing ; but it is one which is quite incompatible with that detailed consideration of Wagner the man requisite to the rehabilitation of his moral character. And the confusion of thought herein implied is rather characteristic of the author's methods throughout.

Thus on one page he professes great regard for the truth, declares that 'neither a work of art nor the character of a good man can be injured by frank treatment,' and holds up hands of horror at Glasenapp's 'outrageous partisanship.' Then on the next page he says, 'For myself, I make no pretension whatever to being unbiassed,' and condemns in unmeasured terms the publication of the Wesendonck letters :

> What shall we say to the action of Madame Cosima Wagner in permitting the publication of a whole series of letters of a most private and sacred kind after her husband had expressly ordered them to be destroyed?

What is one to say (the reader is moved to retort) to the attitude of the earnest seeker after truth who would apparently favour the suppression of such evidence as this, bearing so directly upon one of the most important matters at issue? How is such an attitude distinguishable from that 'outrageous partisanship' which Mr. Hight condemns in Glasenapp? It is open to anyone to take the view that Cosima failed in her duty qua wife in publishing these lettters—assuming the facts to be as Mr. Hight represents them—for it is a well-established principle of law that a wife cannot be called upon to give evidence against her husband. But it is ludicrous to maintain that the world at large, plus royaliste que le roi (or in this case la reine !), should preserve a conspiracy of silence on the subject, and lend itself to the hushing up of matter which even Wagner's own devoted wife did not think it desirable to suppress. Yet this is apparently Mr. Hight's attitude.

Altogether, therefore, it is not very surprising if in the circumstances it is not a very brilliant defence of the Master which Mr. Hight puts up. Certainly if this is the best that can be said for him, it amounts to little enough—as Mr. Ernest Newman has had no difficulty in showing. For it is of course to Mr. Newman, and to no one else, that Mr. Hight is referring when he speaks of the 'English press,' and it would really have been franker if he had said so. It may be true, as he states, that Wagner has been much assailed of late years in what he calls the 'slums of the German press,' but there has been nothing of the kind over here ; and the suggestion of any general besmirching of the composer's character in the 'English press' is quite unjustified.

On the other hand it is undoubtedly a fact that Mr. Newman has published in his 'Wagner as Man and Artist' a portrait of the Master which exposes with merciless severity all his weaker features. A more remarkable piece of work of its kind has indeed rarely been accomplished ; and it is all the more crushing and convincing precisely because it is not what Mr. Hight would seem to imply, a mere essay in mud-slinging, but a most careful and judicious examination of all the facts of the case based on a laborious investigation of the evidence undertaken in the most detached and level-headed spirit. And such an examination of the real facts was called for because of that 'outrageous partisanship' and blind uncritical hero-worship of Wagner's earlier followers, which Mr. Hight himself condemns in Glasenapp.

Doubtless it is much more agreeable when we can say of a great man, 'Nothing is here for tears'— no weakness, no contempt,

Dispraise or blame—nothing but well and fair, and it is a happy tendency of mankind always to want to think the best of its benefactors. But no good can come from wilful suppression or perversion of the truth ; and when, as in this case, the facts are known to all who care to seek them, it is the purest futility to continue ignoring their existence. Nor is there the slightest reason why anyone should wish to do so. Wagner himself, with most of the others concerned, has long since gone the way of all flesh, and, however it may have been in his life-time, there is no longer any reason whatsoever why he should be presented to the world other than he actually was, 'warts and all.' Also he is a big enough man to withstand the process. What possible purpose Mr. Hight considers he is serving by adopting the contrary course, and putting forth yet another fancy portrait, it is impossible to imagine. Cui bono? A 'critical biography' on these lines is nothing but an absurdity.

Admitting the worst that can be urged against Wagner—his egotism and selfishness, which put aside all other considerations save the attainment of his own ends, his unfortunate habit of captivating the affections of other men's wives (Laussot, Wesendonck, Cosima), his extremely elastic conscience where monetary obligations were concerned, and so on—there is plenty that one can still admire whole-heartedly : his superb belief in himself, his invincible courage in adversity, and above all his magnificent fidelity from first to last to the highest artistic ideals. If his conscience was accommodating regarding such trifling matters as loans from friends and tradesmen's bills, it was true as steel when his art was concerned, and even in his worst extremities he never wavered by a hair's-breadth from the strait path in this respect. And doubtless he felt that this was a vastly more important matter than anything else.

The truth is, I imagine, that he realised from the first that he had it in his power to confer on the world infinitely more than the world could ever repay, and if in the ordinary course of events he could not obtain the relatively trifling pittance which he required for his material needs, he was not too scrupulous how he made good the deficiency and supplied his requirements. And really it was fortunate for the world at large that he took this large view of the matter.

Whether there was any real necessity for the perpetual money troubles which afflicted Wagner so sorely throughout the greater part of his career is another matter. Certainly it is impossible not to feel that, given a little more tact and judgment, he might easily have managed much better than he did. The point to be borne in mind in this connection is that so far from having to fight for recognition, as is usually supposed, he had remarkably little to complain of in this respect.

From 'Rienzi' onwards most of his works were enthusiastically received when first produced, and it was only bad luck, coupled with Wagner's unfortunate knack of getting at loggerheads with all the most influential people, his fellow-composers, the critics, the conductors, the managers—in a word, everybody who counted—that prevented these good starts from being turned to better account. A typical instance of his tactlessness was when he actually left unanswered a letter from von Hülsen, the Intendant of the Berlin Opera, because he had dared to stipulate for the right to give 'Die Walküre' separately ! Even when, with unheard of luck, he was taken up by King Ludwig and had the royal purse to draw upon, things went hardly any better.

On these and other aspects of Wagner's main career Mr. Hight is safe and sound, though his style lacks sprightliness, while a good many of his pages might, I think, have been more profitably utilised. Why, for example, he should, at this time of day, have thought it necessary to devote long chapters to the stories of the operas, it is hard to understand. Similarly his voluminous information on the literary sources of the dramas, though useful to students, will, I fancy, have little interest for the average music-lover. More acceptable, perhaps, will be the summaries of Wagner's prose writings, which constitute another feature of the work.

Mr. Hight seems indeed to be stronger in general on the literary than on the musical side of his subject, appearing to be curiously shy of tackling the latter. In fact he goes so far as to declare explicitly : 'I am convinced that the less said about music as music the better.' But why ? one would like to know. Certainly it is Wagner's music, not his ethics or his philosophy, his poetry or his drama, which mainly interests musicians and the world in general, and to write a Life of him saying as little as possible about his music seems a paradoxical proceeding. To which it may be added that when Mr. Hight does break his curious rule, he rather frequently goes wrong. Thus, what he refers to as the Eva motive is really the Summer Night theme. And again what he calls the Fate motive is really that of the Spear or the Treaty. Neither was 'Rienzi' ever a 'one-Act opera' as he asserts—by what, I fancy, must have been a slip of the pen. But these are small matters, as are such misprints as Jago for Iago, and Zumpa for Zumpe ; and in general the work bears every evidence of having been carefully and conscientiously produced by one who has spared no pains to do justice to his subject.

'The Little Chronicle of Magdalena Bach.'

[Chatto & Windus, 6*s*.]

It was a happy thought of the anonymous author of this book to give us a sight of Bach as he might have been seen by his second wife, Anna Magdalena. The task was difficult, but it could hardly be better done than it is here. The plan and style of the work are best shown by an extract from the opening page :

> In my solitude I had a visit this day which has cheered my heart. Caspar Burgholt, that old and favourite pupil of my beloved Sebastian, sought me out and came to visit me—and, indeed, it needed some seeking to discover Dame Bach in her seclusion of poverty, so quickly are forgotten our more prosperous days. . . . Most of all we talked of the one who is dead—of his master and my husband. After we had recalled many things of those wonderful years, Caspar said a word which gives a meaning to my present hidden existence : 'Write,' he said, 'write a little chronicle of that great man. You knew him as no one else knew him, write all that you remember—and I do not suppose that your faithful heart has forgotten much—of his words, his looks, his life, his music. People neglect his memory now, but not always will he be forgotten, he is too great for oblivion, and some day posterity will thank you for what you shall write.'

So we have an intimate chronicle, from the first day the youthful Magdalena saw and heard Bach down to his passing and burial. A certain amount of the book is admittedly apocryphal, but nothing strikes the reader as far-fetched. The main incidents of Bach's life are woven into the narrative neatly enough, though it is inevitable that the reader who knows his Bach biographies will sometimes feel that the author has been overhauling the volumes for plums. Perhaps it is inevitable, too, that the disarming simplicity and naturalness of the opening chapters should have been scarcely maintained throughout so long a stretch—nearly a couple of hundred pages. At its best moments the book is quite moving in its sincerity and naturalness. The dedication is 'To all who love Johann Sebastian Bach,' and there is no doubt about the author's affection for the composer. It is one more reminder of Bach's almost unique faculty for inspiring strong personal feeling among his admirers. Probably no other of the world's great creative spirits has the power in a greater, or even in an equal, degree. It is a marvellous fact that thousands of us know this long-dead German musician far more intimately than we do many of our every-day friends and associates. And, apparently, of all the arts music is best able to serve as a medium for this mysterious bridging of the gulf of time and nationality. The identity of the unnamed author of this 'Little Chronicle' will invite speculation. One might begin by hazarding a guess as to the sex—a woman, surely! Anyway, he or she is to be thanked for a sincere and appealing piece of work. H. G.

'The Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Its organization, growth, and development, 1891-1924.' By Philo Adams Otis.

[Clayton F. Summy Co., Chicago.]

Mr. Otis here sets out in detail the records of this famous Orchestra from its inception—programmes, names of soloists, brief biographies of many of the people mentioned, &c., together with the treasurer's report for each season. Incidentally many passages of interest occur. Thus the autumn season of the fateful year 1914 finds Chicago very little concerned with the cataclysm that seemed so far off. We read that the first concert drew the customary crowd,

> . . . and seemed like the reunion of old friends who meet to discuss the happenings of the summer. It was not 'war talk' which absorbed the thoughts of the audience that lovely October afternoon, but a peaceful subject, far from 'war's alarms'—hats! The Executive Committee, on March 6, in response to many complaints from patrons of the concerts, passed a resolution . . . requiring ladies to remove their hats and keep them off during the entire performance. . . . One angry ticket-holder raised a noisy objection, but was silenced in short order by an usher, while the rest of the audience quietly settled back to enjoy one of Mr. Stock's choicest programmes.

But the programmes for 1917-18 tell a different tale, opening with 'The Star-Spangled Banner' and closing with addresses on such subjects as 'Liberty Bonds' and 'Food Saving.'

Advocates for the use of the organ at symphony concerts will be interested to hear that the instrument has always played a worthy part in these Chicago programmes, such organ players as Guilmant, Middleschulte, Dunham, Eddy, and others playing in solos and Concertos by Handel, Rheinberger, Guilmant, &c.

Paderewski figures in a dispute at the Exposition of 1892 concerning his use of a Steinway pianoforte. Steinways refused to exhibit at the Exposition, whereupon the exhibitors demanded that no instruments should be used in concerts at the Exposition other than those made by exhibitors. Paderewski refused to be bound, and a Steinway was smuggled into the grounds during the night before his performance, despite the threat of the World's Fair Director that any taboo instrument found would be 'dumped outside the gates.' The dispute led to the retirement of Theodore Thomas from the post of Director of Music at the Exposition, as a result of a bitter compaign by the press. Thomas seems to have been badly treated during the greater part of his career. He did a great work for Chicago, and Mr. Otis's book is a worthy memorial to him and the other public-spirited and munificent folk to whom the city owes her present musical status. The book provides useful data for all who are interested in the subsidising of orchestral music. X.

The Psychology of a Musical Prodigy.' By G. Révész.

[Kegan Paul, 10*s.* 6*d.*]

A small Hungarian boy, Erwin Nyiregyházi, tried to sing at the age of one. At two he could imitate melodies he heard; at three his sense of absolute pitch was proved. Before he was four he began to play on the pianoforte everything he heard, and was already composing. In his sixth year he entered the Budapest Academy of Music. When he was ten (that is, just before the war) he was surprising the world as a musical prodigy, and played before the Royal Family and the Prime Minister in London.

The author of this book knew the child when he was seven, and then lost touch with him when he was eleven. He is a psychologist and a musician, and the child made an interesting case for his observation.

Out of his notes he has now composed a rather pompous book which has, however, interesting points. What it tells us, in sum, is that the infant, Erwin Nyiregyházi, developed musically in ten years as far as normally-musical children go in twice the time. He not only had instinctive musical aptitudes, he was generally a bright youngster. At nine or ten he discussed and criticised bygone composers 'like a little old man,' as the saying is. His facility at the pianoforte was remarkable. A series of little compositions, dating from his eighth to his twelfth year, show him as five to ten years ahead of ordinary musical children. Particularly striking was the delicacy of his ear. He analysed normal chord-progressions (struck on a pianoforte placed out of his sight) without fault or the least hesitation. When it came to such concatenations as :

the little Hungarian (aged seven)—all unprotected by any N.S.P.C.C.—analysed chords one and two the first time they were played, and made a good shot the second time at the third example—of the thirteen notes, ten were named correctly, three were doubled, and only three omitted.

In fact, to sum up briefly a great many of the professor's pages, the boy was both gifted and precocious, and the parents were justified (to have done otherwise would have been a crime) in encouraging his musical faculties, nor can they be blamed for recalling the example of the infant Mozart and hoping accordingly.

All the same, after examining the professor's tests and tabulations we are not able to see that they tend anywhither in particular. He proves, and proves again, that E. N.'s sense of pitch was extraordinarily acute, so acute as to be indeed an embarrassment at times. He leaves us in no doubt of the mental smartness of the lad, and he also implies (though he is careful not to assume it openly) that such exceptional beginnings must have exceptional continuations. These observations of his may, he thinks, help to explain the development of the famous musicians who flourished before there were psychologists.

But what and who is E. N. now? He is said to be following the career of a pianist in the United States, and he is twenty-two. If he were a second Mozart we in Europe should probably have become acquainted with his name before now. He may be successful in the U.S.A., but so far as musical Europe is concerned, he is obscure. What then is the moral which Prof. Révész has omitted from his statement of the case? Why, that at ten a child may appear to be a second Mozart, but that at twenty he may have become only a man-in-the-street. Or otherwise, that mere precociousness is not the whole of musical genius.

Lucky the precocious, certainly. In music more than anything they have an enviable handicap which the slow starters find it hard to overtake. A certain precociousness appears to be quite essential to the making of any first-rate executant. But precociousness is not half of the composer's battle.

If Prof. Révész's little friend ever turns out a considerable composer this book will be a fund for biographers. Otherwise it is a warning to the fond, over-sanguine parent. The little E. N.'s talents prompted his psychologist to compile a comparative chapter dragging in Bach, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and many others. And now this prodigy is only a pianist with an American reputation. C.

'The Opera.' By R. A. Streatfeild. With an Introduction by J. A. Fuller-Maitland. Fifth Edition, revised, enlarged, and brought down to date by Edward J. Dent.

[Routledge, 8*s.* 6*d.*]

'The Opera Goers' Complete Guide.' By Leo Melitz.

[Dent, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

'Opera at Home.' Third Edition, enlarged and revised.

[The Gramophone Company, 5*s.*]

A sign of the growing interest in opera in this country is the steady crop of books on the subject. As these usually confine themselves to a boiling-down of the plots, there was need for a work dealing with the growth and development of the form. Streatfeild's 'The Opera' has long since so thoroughly proved its worth that this enlarged edition makes the writing of a new work unnecessary. It contrives very neatly to fulfil the double purpose of a history and a collection of synopses. There seems to be no important work omitted, and Mr. Dent brings it down to date so thoroughly that it includes 'The Perfect Fool' and 'Hugh the Drover.' Mr. Dent has also recast certain chapters, and added at the beginning a passage on the general principles of music-drama. It is difficult to see how this revision of a thirty-year-old book could have been better done. Readers would perhaps welcome some indication as to whether the critical opinions in certain places were those of Mr. Streatfeild or Mr. Dent. But this is a mere detail, and does not affect the value of a study which will no doubt remain a standard work for a long time to come.

'The Opera Goers' Complete Guide' is a translation of a work by the Director of the Stadt Theatre at Basle. It is on the usual lines of such books, and comprises two hundred and sixty-eight opera plots, with lists of dramatis personæ. It is well up to date, giving particulars of such recent works as 'Nerone,' 'Alkestis,' 'Hugh the Drover,' and 'The Perfect Fool.' The synopses are concise and, apparently, as clear as such poor and involved stories as opera plots can ever be when boiled down to essentials. The volume, of nearly six hundred pages, is handy in size and well bound. No music-type examples are given; a useful feature is the insertion in the synopses of the opening words of important musical numbers, as thus, in the 'Damnation of Faust':

> Faust, a learned philosopher, wanders in the fields at sunrise meditating upon Nature. (Faust: 'Now ancient winter hath made place for spring.') He observes a crowd of peasants who dance and sing, jesting rudely. The Hungarian troops approach to martial music. Great excitement prevails among the peasants, Faust alone remaining cold and unmoved. (Chorus: 'The shepherd early dons his best'; Hungarian March.)

And so on.

The Gramophone Company's excellent and handsome book, issued first in 1920, is bigger and better than ever. The fact of a third edition being called for in so short a time (the first edition was twenty thousand) is a striking testimony to its usefulness. Sir Hugh Allen contributes a Preface to the new version, prophesying a rosy future for opera in this country, and suggesting as essentials (1) 'opera in English, so that we can listen unimpeded by our ignorance of what is being said,' and (2) 'English opera on subjects which are entirely intelligible, and within the range of our ordinary experience.' The second of these conditions will probably prove the more difficult of achievement. The composers are ready, but we may have to wait for the librettists. H. G.

'Orlando Gibbons.' By Edmund H. Fellowes.

[Oxford University Press, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

'Early Tudor Composers.' By W. H. Grattan Flood.

[Oxford University Press, 6*s.*]

'Luis Milan and the Vihuelistas.' By J. B. Trend.

[Oxford University Press, 6*s.*]

Dr. Fellowes's book makes a timely appearance during the Gibbons Tercentenary celebrations. His five chapters deal with the Gibbons family—William Edward, and Ellis; Orlando and Christopher; Orlando's Church Music; Secular Vocal Music; and Instrumental Music. An Appendix comprises various wills and other documents, and a Genealogical Chart of the family. There is a portrait of Orlando, a facsimile of a bill at Westminster Abbey with his autograph, and a photograph of the monument at Canterbury.

Dr. Grattan Flood's work consists of a collection of thirty-two chapters that appeared in the Musical Times from 1919 to 1924. They have been revised and recast, and in the attractive form of one of the Oxford Musical Essays should be sure of a welcome. As Sir Henry Hadow remarks in his Preface, the volume 'will be indispensable to the musical historian of the future.' Readers of this Journal are so often indebted to Dr. Flood's erudite pen that detailed praise of his research work is superfluous.

Just as we English are discovering our lutenist composers, so there is a revival of interest in their Spanish equivalents, the vihuelistas. The vihuela was an instrument partaking of the character of both lute and guitar. It had six strings, tuned so nearly like the modern guitar that works for vihuela can be played on the guitar with a little adjustment. The system of notation, like that of our lutenists, was that known as tablature. Mr. Trend gives an interesting account of Luis Milan, wit, courtier, and musician, and by way of appendix includes nine short compositions by Milan and other composers of the period. It is a pity the author credits the average reader with a knowledge of Spanish. A translation of a good many passages should have been provided. Presumably the omission is due to the fact that the book is one of a series of Hispanic Notes and Monographs issued by the Hispanic Society of America. But there is now so much interest in old composers that the book has an appeal for the general musical public, whose acquaintance with Spanish is very limited. C. W.

COLUMBIA

The record of Bruno Walter and the Philharmonic Orchestra in 'Siegfried's Journey to the Rhine' strikes me as being an improvement on that of Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration.' Perhaps the opinion is due partly to the fact that the appeal of the music is greater; but there are also some strikingly successful features in the Wagner record. For example, I do not recall better reproduction of low brass chords, and the drums for once in a way sound like drums and not like cheap tin trays. There is a notable passage on the bass clarinet, too. Altogether a fine record (12-in.). The Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Sir Hamilton Harty, is heard in Brahms's Academic Festival Overture, which somehow always sounds a good deal less festive than the title promises. The Hallé players do nothing to remove that impression (12-in.).

For something really festive I turn to the Haydn Quartet in F (Op. 3, No. 5), recorded by the Léner party. This is a pure delight, despite the falling off in the slow movement, where Haydn gives the melody of the first violin an accompaniment entirely in pizzicato chords, whose plonking of tonic and dominant soon palls. Once through will probably do for this side, but you will encore the first and last movements again and again (two 12-in.). 'Queens of Song' we know; here is 'Britain's King of 'Cellists,' as per June Bulletin. As there are probably several of his Majesty, I add that this particular one is W. H. Squire, who is recorded on a 10-in., playing an arrangement of Dvorák's 'Songs my mother taught me' and the familiar battle-horse, Dunkler's 'La Fileuse'.

William Murdoch provides a good pianoforte record—Grieg's 'An der Fruhling,' Chopin's A major Prelude, and Cyril Scott's 'Danse Negre.'

For military band enthusiasts (I am one) there is Pougher's 'Reminiscences of Tosti,' played by the Grenadier Guards (12-in.). However, to enjoy this one has also to be a Tosti enthusiast. (I am not.)

Vocal records are of Riccardo Stracciari (airs from 'La Tosca' and 'La Wally'); Elsa Stralia ('Bel raggio' and 'Elizabeth's Greeting'); Dora Labbette ('Comin' through the rye' and 'Loch Lomond,' with string quartet); and Harold Williams ('I am a friar of orders grey' and 'Simon the cellarer,' with orchestra, but with less humour than we should like).

H.M.V.

Something seems to have gone agley with the packing of this month's parcel. At all events, several of the most important instrumental records described in the list were absent. Two that came were a 12-in. of Paul Whiteman's Orchestra playing Victor Herbert's 'Suite of Serenades'—lively stuff, though a real serenade on such strepitous lines would probably cause a breach of the peace; and Backhaus in a brilliant record — Moszkowski's 'Caprice Espagnole' and a 'Bohemian Dance' of Smetana (12-in.).

Of vocal records, those of John Goss and the Cathedral Male-Voice Quartet in sea shanties and other ditties from the 'Week-end Book' are capital fare for the holiday season (or, indeed, any old time). There are about a dozen items, ranging from 'Billy Boy' and 'Lilliburlero' to 'O good ale, thou art my darling' and the 'spiritual,' 'Sinner, please doan let this harvest pass,' with as varied types in between. It is a pleasure to find recorded such singing as this of Goss—worth far more than most of the shriekings, bellowings, and brayings, in divers tongues, of operatic stars (four 10-in.).

Devout worshippers of Gerhardt (I can never get beyond the porch) will hail her latest record, Schubert's 'Wohin' and 'Das Lied im Grünen' (10-in.).

Eric Marshall maintains his good form in Tchaikovsky's 'None but the weary heart' (sung in German —warum?) and Wagner's 'Dreams,' the former being the better of the two (10-in.).

Toti dal Monte and Jeritza are now in everybody's mouth. The former is recorded in 'Selva spaca,' from 'William Tell,' and 'Deh! vieni.' The voice, as received per gramophone, has some hard, unappealing notes, but an even worse fault is the style in the Mozart. The rhythm is sacrificed to display, and the portamento is badly overdone. The really artistic feature of this item is the delightful playing and recording of the orchestra. The prima donna really cuts a poor figure by the side of her wind-instrument colleagues. Some day, when audiences really know what's what, a few bouquets will change their destination (12-in.). Jeritza is heard to better advantage. She is finely expressive in 'Vissi d' arte,' from 'Tosca,' and 'Voi lo sapete,' from 'Cavalleria Rusticana' (12-in.).

Gigli is heard in 'O Paradiso,' from 'L'Africana,' and 'M'appari tutt' amor,' from 'Martha' (12-in.).

But the palm for operatic records goes to Apollo Granforte (a nom de guerre, surely!), who provides a real thrill with the 'Credo' from 'Otello,' and 'O Monumento!' from 'La Gioconda.' Here are a voice and style so dramatic that one sees as well as hears. On the form shown in this record, Apollo is worth a battalion of ordinary recording 'stars' (12-in.).

VOCALION

Only one orchestral record comes for review this month—a 10-in. of the Æolian Orchestra, conducted by Stanley Chapple, playing Howells's 'Puck's Minuet'—a delightful piece, worthily recorded. It has a rather tame companion in Järnefelt's 'Berceuse.' Operatic recording has also been quiet during the month, the only record of the type received being a 12-in. of Murray Davey in 'Pogner's Address' and 'Qui sdegno.' This is good singing, but Mr. Davey's voice is hardly weighty enough for the Mozart, which calls for an Allin or McEachern. A defect in the Wagner piece is the bad balance. The orchestral part is as important as that of the voice—perhaps even more so, and unless it is made a good deal more prominent than it is here, the music loses a lot of interest.

Sammons, Tertis, and Ethel Hobday combine with the usual excellent results in the Allegretto from Mozart's Trio, No. 7 (Op. 16). On the reverse side is Tchaikovsky's familiar 'Barcarolle,' played by Tertis (12-in.).

Malcolm McEachern is heard in Slater's 'From Oberon in Fairyland,' for which his splendid voice seems too big, and in W. H. Jude's 'The mighty deep,' for which it is too good (12-in.). How can McEachern bring himself to sing such an appalling song? One thought it had disappeared, with 'The Diver' and the rest of the dreadful submarine ditties of the old-time smoking concert. Apparently nothing is too banal for a popular singer to revive. We may yet hear 'I'd be a butterfly' and 'I would I were a bird.'

Player-Piano Notes*

BY WILLIAM DELASAIRE

CLASSICAL

Of the 'Duo-Art' rolls, I think I like best Scriabin's Impromptu, Op. 10, No. 2, in A (A.C. 6704), an exquisite little piece in his most Chopinesque, yet already distinctive, style. I naturally include it under this heading, but let no one be deterred from buying it by terrifying memories of 'Vers la flamme,' for example. The playing, by Alexander Borovsky, does not specially appeal—I prefer the 'Animatic' version by Joseph Wijsman. We get Chopin in his most introspective mood in the Mazurka, Op. 17, No. 4, in A minor (A.C. 6809). The first subject is a remarkable example of emotional effect wrought with extreme economy of means, and the intense sadness of it seems to overshadow the rather simulated joy of the second section. Paderewski provides an interpretation that disarms criticism, and makes the roll an exacting test for a reproducing instrument. The slow movement of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony (A.C. 0669) is again a reminder of the wonderful colour of the music, but as a reproduction falls far short of a good gramophone record—the orchestral colour is so intimately bound up with the music.

Among the ordinary rolls, Godowsky gives us one of his pianistic tours de force in 'Badinage' (A.C. T24635 and A.S. 93451), in which Chopin's 'Butterfly' and 'Black Key' studies are combined. It is exceedingly clever, but I prefer them one at a time. Chopin's lovely Etude in A flat (No. 2 of 'Trois Nouvelles Etudes') (A.C. T24630 and A.S. 93453) is re-issued, but it suffers, as did the earlier roll, from having too short a bar-length, which makes a 'square' performance exceedingly difficult to avoid. Incidentally, despite the prefix to the number, the roll is not accented, which it might well be in places, especially in the left-hand part.

The 'Great' G minor Fantasia and Fugue of Bach is distinctively played by Ernesto Consolo (A.N. 53265). The Fantasia is very freely interpretated, but failing the adoption of Mr. Ernest Newman's suggestion that these big organ works should be arranged direct from the score, this is the best version of it with which I am acquainted. A hand-played roll of exceptional merit is Alfred Reisenauer's performance of the Chopin Barcarolle (A.N. 51767). Apart from the exquisite beauty of the music, the wide spacing of the notes allows the performer to play it with much greater ease and certainty of control than is possible on a straight-cut arrangement. This is certainly a roll to buy. Not hand-played, but none the less extremely beautiful, is Rubinstein's arrangement of Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll' (A.N. 54143). Despite the loss of orchestral colour, the intrinsic merit of the music is impossible of disguise. Indeed it is full of unexampled beauty and tenderness, greatly inspiring to the performer. Granados plays superbly two numbers from his 'Goyescas.' They are 'Love Words' (A.N. 5118) and 'Lamentations' (A.N. 51121). I cannot too highly praise these rolls, which in my opinion are two of the finest in the whole vast catalogue of player-music. The music is as inspired as the playing is wonderful. What delightful music still is the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream'! The playing demands delicate, rhythmic accent, but the music is so pearly clear that this presents no difficulty at all. For students of chamber music there is a four-hand arrangement of Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 25, in G minor (A.N. 52461-4). Pianistically it is not good; but educationally it is invaluable.

POPULAR

The 'Duo-Art' rolls provide some excellent salon music, among which Emil Sauer's 'Echo de Vienne' (A.C. 0227) takes first place. Cleverly written, brilliant, and tuneful, in its class it could hardly be bettered, I imagine. The playing, by the composer, matches the music perfectly.

'Chrysanthemums,' by William H. Penn (A.C. 6710), is undistinguished, but will please many; Geneviève Pitot's playing is in fine pianistic style, and provides the maximum of artistic effect. Schutt's

* A.C. = Æolian Co., Ltd.; A.S. = Sir Herbert Marshall & Sons, Ltd.; A.N. = Hupfeld, Ltd.

'Mélancolie' (A.C. 0670) is an expressive little piece, also well played, this time by Ethel Litchfield. These three rolls are all valuable, if for no other reason than for the extraordinarily faithful way in which the mannerisms and style of the pianists are recorded. Every subtlety of rubato and rhythmic variation is reproduced in a manner which should convert all but the hopelessly prejudiced person.

The hand-played rolls provide principally pieces in dance form. The best is undoubtedly Smetana's 'Bohemian Dance,' played with splendid verve by Backhaus (A.C. A789). The principal subject rushes upwards with a fine thrill, and provides an excellent study in rhythmical pedalling. Such a passage naturally demands a crescendo, but an ear must be given to the intensity of this by those who wish to match their performance as nearly as possible with the original. Pneumatics can so easily do what human fingers—even though they be those of a Backhaus—cannot accomplish: i.e., apply great power at speed. Two good pieces in the concert waltz vein are Palmgren's 'Valse Mignonne,' Op. 54, No. 1 (A.C. A787), and Liebling's 'Florence Waltz,' played by Geneviève Pitot (A.C. A793). Neither is very original, but both are charming little drawing-room pieces. The Palmgren is perhaps the more interesting, as being a composer-pianist roll, although scarcely representative of his best work. But in both these rolls the interest is at least as much in the playing as in the music. I condemned Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Espagnole' when it appeared as a 'Duo-Art' roll some months ago, and I see no reason to reverse my judgment now that it is issued as a hand-played roll (A.C. A795). I am afraid it is little more than noisy rubbish, quite unworthy of the heavy demands which it makes upon the performer—in this case Miss Rosita Renard, who, however, does it more than justice. I suppose it may dazzle at the first few performances, but the plethora of notes remains to obscure what music there is in it. Paul Juon's 'Humoreske' (A.N. 58114) really is humorous. It keeps up a pleasant chatter, which is interrupted occasionally by an irrelevant harmonic sweep that is delightful and provides much scope for careful playing.

Arensky's Basso Ostinato, so beloved of organists, is issued as an ordinary roll (A.C. T24634 and A.S. 93452). It is technically interesting, but makes no special emotional appeal to my ears. Præludium, Op. 20, No. 1, by V. Andreæ (A.C. T224627 and A.S. 93454), is pompous, but worthless; and Liszt pours out more virtuosity in 'La Danza' (A.S. 88924), which again leaves me cold.

SONGS

Quilter's 'Fair House of Joy' (A.C. 26487 and A.S. 72518) makes a splendid song roll, which it is as delightful to play as to sing. I most cordially recommend it. The same may be said of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Elëanore' (A.S. 72367), which, with its dramatic style, offers a fine opportunity to both singer and accompanist—to restrain themselves. Already exceedingly popular, Easthope Martin's 'Ballad Monger' (A.S. 72505) and 'Fairings' (A.C. 26485 and A.S. 72519) should become increasingly so in roll form. And if you shut your eyes to the words and your ears to the music you may enjoy 'In a Monastery Garden' (A.S. 26513).

DANCE MUSIC

The Æolian dance rolls are as ingeniously arranged as ever, and render preferences difficult to establish, but I think that three of the best are 'So this is love,' a really languorous waltz; 'The melody that made you mine' (what a superb tribute to the power of music!); and 'Alabamy Bound.' If these are not already popular, I should imagine they soon will be.

MUSIC AT A BORSTAL INSTITUTION

At a time when music, as a subject of general educational value, is so much 'in the air,' it may not be out of place to give some account of the Feltham Borstal Institution Music Society—a venture which seems to many of us, on account of its achievements in the face of difficult conditions, and its possibilities, peculiarly significant. Most of those who work in schools find plenty of obstacles to deal with, but in most places these difficulties are not material. Schools generally have the means of getting music if they want it; they have musicians, copies, decent instruments; and can get by levies, forced loans, and other exactions, money to buy what they lack. What school music has to compete with is apathy, ignorance, and that stupid, self-satisfied superiority usually associated with athleticism. At the Institution of which we are speaking there was not only apathy; there was absolutely no means of getting either music, musicians, instruments, or money.

The Borstal Institution at Feltham houses about three hundred boys between the ages of sixteen and twenty-three, for periods varying from two to three years. They come from all sorts of surroundings, victims often of social conditions with which few of us could contend. Any intellectual appeal to them must be of the simplest sort, for although their mental gifts are often of a high order, circumstances have generally made it impossible for them to develop normally, although under kindlier conditions they often rapidly do so. The idea that music should form a part of their training came to Feltham with the arrival of a new tutor, who, having needed and known the consolation which only music can give, was filled with a determination to bring music into the lives of those in his care. He collected some money among his friends, got promises of help from amateur musicians, and started a music club. Ninety boys joined in the first access of enthusiasm, and, after the usual wastage, numbers have settled down at about sixty. Conditions of membership are 'an interest, hard work, and an unstained record of conduct in the p'ace.' A 'report' before the Governor, however slight, means expulsion, and the result is a high standard of conduct and a keen feeling of pride and self-respect. Fortnightly concerts have been given, and many generous amateurs have helped at them. Concert parties have been sent down by the People's Concert Society, and the Village, Country Town, and School Concert Society, and there have been recitals by the English Singers, by Walter Rummel, and by Harold Samuel. The organizer cannot speak highly enough of the generosity and sympathy of the artists whom he has approached.

Needless to say, the music performed is always of the best. Such of the best is chosen as speaks readily, but there is no attempt to solicit attention by any tawdry appeal. Rummel, for instance, played a Triple Fugue and three Chorale Preludes of Bach, the 'Moonlight' Sonata, and a Chopin group, and he was tremendously appreciated. Only those, indeed, who have themselves played to the boys can realise the concentrated way in which they listen. There is an atmosphere entirely different from that of the ordinary concert, when people already sated with music listen half-heartedly to what they don't really want to hear. These boys drink it in as if they were thirsty for it, and the player cannot but be conscious of this, and of the consequent and unusually close intimacy between himself and his audience.

This intimacy is really the essence of the whole matter. It is the raison d'être of the Society, which is an attempt, over and above the mere study of music, to bring personal contacts of the best sort within the knowledge of those who have hitherto been deprived of them. The boys' imaginations go out creatively to meet those of the composer and the interpreter, and a new planet swims into their ken. The experience draws out new feelings and thoughts from minds hitherto unawakened, and may be an influence of the utmost strength and goodness. The merely æsthetic side of it is a big enough thing, but it goes beyond that—self-sacrifice is demanded, and the appreciation of music is associated, and felt to be so, with certain ideals of conduct and manners; the boys visibly and astonishingly develop under its influence. Without sentimentalising, we can imagine what it may mean to some of them when a musician like Rummel, who has played finely, talks with them, and shakes hands with them—not patronisingly, but as one human being that greets others.

I need not attempt to conceal my belief that here already is an educational achievement of the greatest importance and potentiality—one compared to which the B minor Mass at Oundle and the Bach Choir at the Leys School, admirable as they are, are insignificant. Some readers, no doubt, are feeling that this article is the child of rash enthusiasm and callow idealism—an unbalanced offspring. I can only wish that such readers could go to a Feltham concert (they would be welcome), or could see some of the letters written by boys who have passed under the influence of the Music Society.

The whole Society and its work are shortly to be incorporated in a general educational scheme based on the same ideas of drawing out talents and ideas, rather than trying to impress them. Singing and reading classes will be started, and it is hoped that these will prepare material for the formation of a choral society and perhaps an orchestra. But if the work is to go on, the Society needs help—it needs music, books, offers of performance, and funds for general purposes. Those who feel moved to offer help of any sort, or to attend concerts, should write to Mr. C. A. Siepmann, H.M.B.I., Feltham, Middlesex, to whose vision and enthusiasm for music is due all that has been done already.

THOMAS ARMSTRONG.

Wireless Notes

BY 'CALIBAN'

The transmission of the Gibbons service from Canterbury Cathedral was one more proof that at present wireless is apt to be beaten by the combination of a large space, an organ, and a choir. The most successful feature was the pealing of the bells—a truly fascinating effect that helped one to visualise the old Kentish city in an extraordinary way. The service itself came through so vaguely that one would not be justified in expressing an opinion on the more complicated music or its performance. But I was able to follow the chanting well enough to feel disappointment and surprise that the combined Cathedral and Chapel Royal Choirs should still be perpetuating the stiff Anglican tradition that makes no account of the rhythm of the text. Rarely have I heard more angular Anglican pointing. A good sample of chanting on an occasion of this kind would be an education to thousands of church folk; the reverse simply retards the efforts now being made in the direction of reform.

The B.B.C. is to be congratulated on the successful transmission of the military tattoo at Aldershot. The massed bands were imposing. (But what banal music most of it was!) Our old friend the '1812' Overture came off well, save in one respect, and that the very one which promised a thrill—the artillery accompaniment. The gunfire reached me as a no more impressive sound than that made by a neighbour chopping firewood, and in the final section the bangs were not a patch on those provided by the big drum at Queen's Hall. Far more impressive was the ensuing applause of the vast crowd at the close.

Mention of applause brings us to the question just now exercising the Company and many of its subscribers. Is a wireless musical performance improved by the addition of applause? Yes and no. When the item is relayed from a big hall and the demonstration is the genuine expression of delight felt by a big crowd, there is a good deal to be said for it. But the spatter of hand-clapping from a few people installed in the studio as a claque, is a footling and irritating affair. It is not genuine, to begin with. Thus, suppose that the claque in its heart of hearts (if a claque has a heart) happens to disapprove of an item. What would happen if it suddenly became honest and maintained a stony silence? Even when its applause is not perfunctory there is too little of it to be effective. As for the idea that performers need the stimulus of applauding hearers, one would think that a singer or player gifted with imagination would find infinitely more stimulus at the thought of his vast unseen audience than in the sight of a score or so of people sitting round. Moreover, it is now established that in every department of wireless entertainment there are new technical problems to be overcome. Among the most important is that of being able to visualise the unseen hearers and to get on terms with them. That this can be done has been proved over and over again by the handful of speakers and musicians who proved to have the necessary 'something' in their equipment, either in voice, or imagination, or style. This faculty will have to be acquired, just as for ordinary concert purposes every singer has to acquire what is called a 'platform manner.' I go so far as to say that a performer who cannot 'put it across' the ether without the aid of a claque can't do it thoroughly well with that aid.

There is a good deal in the suggestion of a correspondent in the Radio Times as to the broadcasting of big sporting events. Many thousands of us who cannot attend (say) the Cup Final, are there in spirit, and would jump at the chance of being kept in touch with the swaying fortunes of the game. Put one of the Uncles on the ground with a microphone, and let him keep up a running description of the play, and a mighty host would rise up and bless the B.B.C. After all, lucky folk in clubs where there is a tape machine follow sporting events almost as closely. Why shouldn't wireless step in and do the job far better for all the world and his wife? I hope the B.B.C. will make an experiment at the beginning of the next football season. Let us follow a match between Tottenham Hotspur and a crack team from the North, and see how it works out. If it does not prove to be one of the most popular moves the B.B.C. has ever made, I shall be surprised.

A month or two ago my colleague 'Feste' said some hard things about the musical articles in the Radio Times. I have a few complaints to fire off on my own account, but space has run out, and they must be deferred until next month.

Occasional Notes

The Gibbons Tercentenary has been celebrated with great vigour, as is fitting; but is Orlando quite so much of a discovery as some of the enthusiasts would have us think? Turning over the Musical Times for July, 1907, we find a five-column report of a Commemoration Service at Westminster Abbey on June 5 of that year. The report shows that an extraordinarily large and influential gathering of musicians was present, representing practically all the chief institutions of the country. The music was directed by Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. W. G. Alcock was at the organ, a string orchestra of twenty-nine players took part, and a choir of three hundred voices had been organized for the occasion by Mr. Henry King. Ninety-six boy-voices were drawn from Westminster Abbey, the Chapel Royal, Canterbury Cathedral, the Temple Church, St. Peter's, Eaton Square, and the Foundling Hospital. (The St. Paul's Cathedral choristers were unavoidably absent.) The two hundred men singers consisted of the lay-vicars of Westminster Abbey and contingents from the choirs of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Chapel Royal, St. Peter's, Eaton Square, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Canterbury Cathedral, Lincoln's Inn Chapel, and other churches, in addition to some members of the Madrigal Society and members of the Worshipful Company of Musicians. The service was preceded by two organ solos—the 'Fantazia of Foure Parts' and the Voluntary in A minor, from John E. West's 'Old English Organ Music' series. The Canticles sung were by Gibbons in F; three anthems followed the third Collect—'Hosanna to the Son of David,' 'This is the record of John,' and 'O clap your hands together.' The Dean of Westminster preached a sermon dealing with Gibbons and his work. After the sermon a procession was made to the North Choir Aisle, and the now well-known bust of Gibbons was unveiled by Princess Christian. This bust, a replica of that in Canterbury Cathedral, was the gift of the late C. T. D. Crews. After the unveiling, four more compositions of Gibbons were sung—the anthems, 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel,' 'O God, the King of Israel' (to an accompaniment for strings and organ), 'O Lord, I lift my heart to Thee,' and 'Lift up your heads.' After the service, Dr. Alcock re-played the 'Fantazia of Foure Parts.'

Our object in reviving this ancient news is to show that even twenty years ago Gibbons was a prophet not without honour in his own country. Furthermore, in these days when it is customary to pooh-pooh all the older Cathedral organists—especially those who flourished in Victorian days—it is well to be reminded that this Commemoration Service was directed by one of the most eminent of those Victorian organists, and that the Service was shared in by representatives of many other Cathedrals.

(We are ready to admit that Gibbons's music would probably sound better with a smaller force than was used on the above occasion. That however, is not the point.)

The recent celebrations will no doubt have taught many that the cause of Tudor and Elizabethan music is not likely to be furthered by the performance of long groups of works whose similarity in mood and style is almost bound to lead to monotony. The call is for a discriminating and regular use of the best of the school. We underline the word, because the tendency of late years has been to publish and perform a good deal of music that has little more than antiquarian interest. This course, so far from popularising Elizabethan music, is far more likely to cause its return to oblivion. If the revival is to be no more than a nine days' wonder, the revivalists must temper their enthusiasm with discretion and a sense of values.

Mr. Ernest Newman probably gave offence in writing the following plain truths apropos of some recent Gibbons concerts:

> There is a good deal of unreality, of merely conventional admiration, about all these Tudor tercentenary celebrations; and it would be interesting to know how many of the audience at these two Gibbons concerts were able to distinguish between the music that is still really alive and the music that has now only an antiquarian value.

Mr. Cyril Scott's opera, 'The Alchemist,' had a very successful première at Essen, and we understand that further performances are to be given. Readers will be interested in the translation of the following extract from the Essener Allgemeiner Zeitung of May 29:

> After we had listened with respect to Debussy's 'Pelléas and Mélisande,' Cyril Scott came forward yesterday with his operatic first-born, 'The Alchemist.' Thus the Frenchman was followed by the Englishman, who possesses the additional advantage of conciseness and sparkling rhythm. . . . He does everything with the utmost refinement and works with all the subtleties of a quite unparalleled knowledge of rhythm. It is an artistic delight to observe his stupendous inventive faculty in this direction. . . . A connoisseur of detail, he employs his harmonies with unequalled skill, and the judicious use of percussion adds to the colour and brilliance of the whole. . . . From the point of view of artistic history, it is interesting that work such as this should be produced to-day. . . . The applause was very enthusiastic.

The pleasant social gathering that followed the distribution of diplomas at the Royal College of Organists in January was so much appreciated that it seems likely to become a regular feature. At all events, it will form a part of the arrangements for July 18. The Distribution of Diplomas takes place at 2.30, and will be followed by a recital of organ works by Bach, Franck, Parry, Guilmant, and Stanford, by Mr. E. T. Cook. After the recital, members and friends will adjourn to the Upper Hall and the proceedings will become informal.

A prize of twenty-five guineas is offered by Music and Letters for an essay on the following thesis :

> A comparative study of indigenous forms of dramatic music and of opera, pointing out in what way they were characteristic of their land of origin and how far they have a bearing on our own problem.

The judges will be Sir Henry Hadow, Mr. Frederic Austin, and the Editor. For length the editor suggests, but does not insist on, five thousand words. Essays must be type-written and unsigned ; the author's name should be enclosed in a sealed envelope bearing an identifying mark or words, which must also appear at the foot of the essay. Essays should reach Major W. M. Marsden, c/o Music and Letters, 22, Essex Street, W.C.2, not later than September 26. The package should be marked 'Nat. Op.' on the left-hand top corner.

Mr. A. B. Walkley, in his weekly articles in The Times, occasionally leaves his usual field and lets himself go on music. His latest effort (sprinkled with the inevitable French tags) deals with the L.S.O. Anniversary concert, and is no happier than some of his other pronouncements on musical subjects. At the start he was easily imposed on. Describing the assembling and tuning-up of the orchestra, he says :

> Someone with a fall of hair enters furtively and tries to slip into his seat unobserved, but he cannot escape the applause of his fellows. It is the 'leader,' the first of the violins.

We have often noticed this entry of the leader, but it has never struck us as being 'furtive,' or as showing any anxiety to advoid notice. A modest leader can 'escape' applause by the simple expedient of coming on to the platform with the rest of the orchestra, instead of making a solitary entry after everybody has settled down.

Mr. Walkley is not a regular attendant at orchestral concerts, if we may judge from his naive delight at what he saw and heard—especially at what he saw. ('Look at those ten double-basses on the left ! An orchestra with ten double-basses is, indeed, "some" orchestra ! ') He becomes lyrical on Koussewitzky, whose entry is 'quiet and restrained' :

> But when he starts the 'Meistersinger' Overture he is a man transformed. The great, blazing, pompous marches lift his arms high above his head, and then down, down they go, pushing the music, as it were, back in its overwhelming advance. . . . The staid and statuesque Englishman may find Mr. Koussewitzky's movements excessive ; but, then, Mr. Koussewitzky is not an Englishman—*c'est tout dire.

The method of Sir Edward Elgar (who conducted his 'Variations') was, 'naturally and rightly, different ; intimate, and, if I may so, homely.' Mr. Walkley tells us how very differently he himself would have played the triangle under the two conductors, and adds :

> I instance the triangle for safety ; because, as a matter of fact, there is no triangle in the L.S.O.

Evidently the one we have heard many a time at L.S.O. concerts was borrowed for the occasion.

* Enough said !

After describing his emotion ('the tears chased one another down my nose'), and quoting somebody's warning against gushing and sentimentalising, he says :

> I feel guilty and apologise for my tears. But what would you ?* I am one of those unfortunates whom great art excites.

He winds up with a tribute to the players :

> I envy these fellows. A great authority, who knows them well, tells me that they are each (sic) accomplished and versatile musicians, able at need to conduct an orchestra of their own.

Without being backward in recognising the merits of the L.S.O. players, we suggest that the 'great authority' was pulling somebody's leg.

The article from which we have quoted, another on 'Jazz,' and one on Epstein's 'Rima' which Sir Owen Seaman riddled in the following week's Punch, suggest that Mr. Walkley should not hastily leave his own department. We are sure that if any one of The Times music critics returned the compliment by writing a dramatic article, he would make a better job of it than this.

Readers will remember the to-do at Vienna recently, when Madame Olczewska, singing at the State Opera House, was annoyed by the talking of Madame Jeritza in the wings, and spat at her. The latest news is that something like harmony has been restored, Madame Olczewska having expressed her 'profound regret for disgracing the dignity of the house, and insulting the public by trying to spit at Madame Jeritza in the wings, missing, and hitting Madame Kittel instead.' We are glad the apology was so ample as to include regret for the deplorable marksmanship.

The incident led to a very successful bit of business on the part of a singer in 'The Bartered Bride,' at Vienna, a few days later. On receiving the contract confirming the sale of the bride he 'spat furiously at it'—with truer aim than that of Madame Olczewska, we trust. The house roared, and continued to show its appreciation of the hit (we assume it was a hit) during the remainder of the scene. The director, Herr Schalk, then went behind the curtain, and issued an order that spucken, or even imitation thereof, was for ever verboten on that stage. So here was a good topical joke cut off in its prime. Think what George Robey could have done with such material, had Madame Olczewska reserved her fire till she came to Covent Garden !

'The Organist as Teacher,' after which Mr. E. T. Cook, organist of Southwark Cathedral, will play upon the College organ the following pieces, selected for the January Examination, 1926 :

FELLOWSHIP

Aria in F ... ... J. S. Bach
(Novello, Book 12, p. 112.)
Prelude, Fugue, and Variation (Op. 18, No. 3)
César Franck

ASSOCIATESHIP

Elegy in A flat major ... ... C. H. H. Parry
(Novello.)
Meditation in F sharp minor ... ... Guilmant
(Book 6, Op. 20.)
Prelude in G minor ... ... Stanford
(No. 2 of first set of Preludes, Op. 101, Stainer & Bell.)

No tickets are required.

An informal conversazione will be held after the organ recital, to which members and their friends are invited. Tea and coffee.

H. A. HARDING, Hon. Secretary.

Members of the College will hear with regret that Dr. Harding has been very ill for some weeks past. At the time of writing, however, he is making such progress as to warrant the hope that he will soon be restored to his accustomed vigour. He may rest assured of the good wishes of all R.C.O. members and friends.

THE DOUBLE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CHORALE PRELUDE

BY CHARLES F. WATERS

The extensive adoption in recent British organ music of the variety of forms embraced by the title 'Chorale Prelude,' provokes consideration of the principles underlying this characteristic type of organ composition. Its origin lies in the extempore variations by Teutonic organists of the 17th century upon the Lutheran Chorales, so prominent a feature of the services of the Reformed Church, and so familiar to, and well-beloved of, the Teutonic people. The submission of these chorales to fugal, coloratura, and other devices, according to the character and structure of the tune, and the intellectual equipment and technical dexterity of the executant, would in essence be understood by his hearers ; and when, in the course of time, a definite art-form was established by these extempore efforts giving place to the written word, it had the singular quality of easy appreciation by those to whom the chorales were so endeared. Moreover, inasmuch as the chorales were definitely allied to and commonly associated with verses appropriate in some cases only to certain festivals or seasons, the chorale prelude became a suitable adjunct to the liturgy of the Church services, serving as a commentary upon the season's message, and giving emphasis to the truths it conveyed. Thus the double significance of the chorale prelude is evident—first, its immediate appeal to, and ready appreciation by, the people ; second, its close association with the Church's service.

These factors render the form a singularly important and convenient one, and it is of interest to note that more than one great composer has in his last years turned to the form to pay, as it were, his respects to the Church and the Church's instrument. Bach's last effort was to dictate the exquisite 'Before Thy throne I come' ; Brahms gave his last musical utterance in his 'Eleven Chorale Preludes' ; César Franck on his death-bed made the final corrections in his nearest approach to the Chorale Prelude ; Parry turned his attention to the organ late in life, but was spared, we may gratefully record, to complete two invaluable sets of chorale preludes, besides the three Choral Fantasias.

A fresh lease of life has been given to the Chorale Prelude in Germany by Max Reger and Karg-Elert, who in their choice of the old chorales and their adoption of the methods of their illustrious predecessor, have fully maintained the tradition. At the same time, British organ composers have in the last few years been establishing a definitely British organ school, as national as the modern French school, in their successful reproduction of the chorale prelude in terms of the familiar, well-beloved, British hymn-tunes.

Is it excessive to claim that the development of the chorale prelude in British organ composition has opened the door to a wider appreciation of a hitherto unappreciated branch of instrumental music in this country ? In any effort to interest people in organ music it appears certain that the most promising starting-point lies in the preludes upon well-known hymn-tunes. Familiarity with the subject treated will lead to a perception of the treatment, and, finally, to an interest in organ music generally.

The heavy and often unrealised responsibility resting upon the organist in his choice of voluntaries can best be met by a suitable adoption of such pieces, according to the festival or season—Parry's 'St. Thomas' or John E. West's 'Winchester New' in Advent ; Charles Wood's Variations and Fugue on 'Winchester Old' at Christmas-tide ; Wallace's Chorale Fantasia, 'Heinlein,' in Lent ; Charles Wood's or Kitson's 'St. Mary,' or Parry's 'Rockingham' and 'St. Cross' Preludes, at Passion-tide, to name but a few. With its double quality of spontaneous appeal and appreciation, and its effective appropriateness to the Church's seasons, the chorale prelude has a double service to render.

THE LATE SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE

A memorial tablet to the late Sir Frederick Bridge has been placed in Westminster Abbey. The unveiling, by the Sub-Dean, took place at Evensong on May 26. The music included Bridge's setting of the Canticles, his anthem 'God's goodness hath been great to thee,' and the hymn, 'The sower went forth sowing,' to Bridge's tune. After the unveiling, his setting of 'Crossing the Bar' was sung. The inscription is as follows :

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE
C.V.O.
Emeritus Organist
ORGANIST OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY
1882-1918
Faithful in Service Skilled in Music
Loving in Friendship
Born 5th December, 1844. Died 18th March, 1924.

It is proposed to establish a scholarship in memory of Bridge. A fund of £1,000 is being raised, and about £300 has already been subscribed.

A new organ was opened at Wesleyan Central Hall, Paisley, on May 24. Dr. Percy Elton gave a recital, playing Dvořák's 'Slavonic' Rhapsody, the Finale of Guilmant's fifth Sonata, F. H. Wood's 'Scenes in Kent,' 'Finlandia,' &c. The organ is a three-manual of twenty-nine stops, built by Messrs. Conacher & Co.

Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, who recently retired from the post of organist at Chester Cathedral to take up the appointment of Director of Studies at Trinity College of Music, has received some handsome parting gifts. The Dean and Chapter presented him with £1,000; and on behalf of numerous friends at Chester and in North Wales, the Mayor of Chester recently handed him a gold watch and a cheque, and the Mayoress presented to Mrs. Bridge an amethyst necklet and a pair of amethyst earrings. Prof. Bridge has also received gifts from the Chester Royal Infirmary Board, the Chester and North Wales Archæological Society, the Old Choristers' Association, the Cathedral Lay-Clerks, the Choristers and Masters of the Choir School, and the Vergers and Bell-ringers.

Readers sometimes ask for suggestions as to music suitable for use with organ and small orchestra, apart from arrangements of familiar symphonies. The following programme is a good answer: Solemn Melody, Walford Davies; Sursum Corda, Elgar; Concerto in G minor, Rheinberger; Largo, Handel; trumpet solo, 'The Lost Chord.' There is something here for both purist and the man in the pew. This excellent programme was given at All Saints', Bradford, Yorks, Mr. Charles Stott being organist, and Mr. Whitby Norton, conductor. The orchestra consisted of three first violins, two seconds, two violas, two 'cellos, one double-bass, two horns, two trumpets, and drums.

After rebuilding by Messrs. Hill & Son and Norman & Beard, the organ in the Guildhall, Cambridge, was opened on May 18. Dr. W. G. Alcock gave recitals in the afternoon and evening, playing Mozart's F minor Fantasia, the Finale from Reubke's Sonata, Guilmant's Funeral March and 'Hymn of Seraphs,' Widor's Allegro Cantabile and Toccata (Symphony No. 5), Saint-Saëns's Rhapsodie on Breton melodies, Liszt's Fantasia and Fugue on B A C H, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, Toccata and Fugue in F, the first movement of Sonata No. 1, his own Toccatina, &c. The instrument is now a three-manual of forty-seven stops.

Dr. H. D. Statham gave a recital at the dedication of the War Memorial organ at Chigwell School, his programme including the first movement of Handel's B flat Concerto, Gibbons's Voluntary in A minor, Bach's C minor Fugue and the first movement of the E flat Sonata, a Purcell Suite, and his own Nocturne in F sharp minor. The organ was built by Messrs. Henry Speechley & Sons, and is a two-manual of sixteen stops.

On the occasion of the visit to St. Anne's, Soho, of the London Society of Organists (May 30), Mr. Albert Orton gave a Bach recital (Sonata No. 4, Passacaglia and Fugue, Prelude and Fugue in G, and four Chorale Preludes); and, after the tea interval, a pianoforte recital, playing Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, Schubert's Impromptu in B flat, Beethoven's D minor Sonata (Op. 31), Debussy's 'Reflets dans l'eau,' a Chopin group, &c.

At Louth Parish Church, on May 14, a special musical service took place in aid of Lincoln Cathedral Restoration Fund. Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' were the chief features. There were a choir and orchestra of a hundred and twenty. Mr. O. M. Price, the organist of the church, conducted, and Dr. G. J. Bennett was at the organ.

Mr. Herbert C. T. Gill, organist of St. James's Church, Bath, has been presented with an illuminated address, a chiming clock, a cheque, and an album containing the names of over three hundred subscribers. The presentation was in recognition of Mr. Gill's twenty-five years of service at St. James's.

Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' was sung at St. Peter's Church, Southsea, on June 3, by the choir, conducted by Mr. Eric B. Sutton. Mr. John A. Jackson accompanied on the organ, and also played Boëllmann's Gothic Suite and Bach's 'Fiddle' fugue in D minor.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have just set up a new organ in the Parish Church at Sway, Hants—a two-manual of thirteen stops and fourteen hand and foot pistons.

Bach's Ascensiontide Cantata, 'Praise our God,' was finely sung, with orchestral accompaniment, at Leeds Parish Church on May 21, conducted by Dr. A. C. Tysoe.

Letters to the Editor

WAS IT 'A RUDE EXCLAMATION'?

SIR,—In view of the strictures so often passed on concert audiences for their undiscerning and ill-timed applause, I am much astonished at the general condemnation which has been hurled at the disapproving gentleman who had the temerity to contradict the prevailing sentiment at the concert of the Philharmonic Society mentioned in your June number.

I have suffered so much from noisy and excessive acclamation and from the encore plague at Queen's Hall and other places, that my heart warms to any man who has the courage, under any circumstances, to express an opinion—provided it be honest—which runs counter to that of the majority.

I was not present at the performance in question, and if I had been, a natural shrinking from notoriety would have forbidden articulate protest even though my musical nerves had been set on edge; but what I desire to know is this: Of what value to a composer is the acclamation of a crowd of persons, mostly untrained in musical technique, with little real musical knowledge, and unqualified as critics, at the first hearing of a new composition? I have a shrewd suspicion that the type of music enthusiast who deems it becoming and correct to burst into noise at a new thing is the same who waxes frantic at Handel's 'Largo,' and demands an encore for 'The Lost Chord' as a cornet solo.

For myself, the approaching close of every item, new or old, on a 'Promenade' programme is a moment of dread; for I know that instead of being allowed to dwell for a space on the beauties of the piece just passing away, every recollection of them will for a time be obscured by senseless noise from hands, tongues, feet, and sticks. So that my usual practice is to wait for the particular item I desire to hear and then to slip away while it is still fresh in my memory, leaving the more hardy listeners to their hand-clapping and shouting.

As for ballad concerts, much as I love the sound of a musical voice, I never go near them from fear of being obliged to listen to 'Home, sweet home,' 'The last rose of summer,' &c., as a result of exaggerated applause.

It is for these reasons that I rejoice at the action of the courageous gentleman which disturbed so notably the general content at the Philharmonic concert.—Yours, &c.,

Hersham, Walton-on-Thames. EUSTACE HARE.

TRINITY MADRIGAL CLUB AT THE COLISEUM

SIR,—In your June issue you refer to my criticism of the Trinity Madrigal Club, of Cambridge, on its appearance at the London Coliseum:

> 'A few weeks ago, for example, even so shrewd and commonsense a critic, and so good a judge of choralism, as Mr. Percy Scholes, writing of the singing of a handful of Cambridge undergraduates at the Coliseum, remarked (I quote from memory) that of course they hadn't the sonority of the crack Northern choirs! Who in the world expected it? What basis of comparison is there between the Sheffield Choir and a little choir of undergraduates singing a few madrigals and chanties by way of a vacation hobby?'

I thank you for your incidental compliment, but as, the compliment concluded, you manage in 'quoting from memory' to make me seem rather ridiculous, I beg to be allowed to repeat, without comment, exactly what I did say:

> 'The singing did not exhibit quite first-rate vocal tone or the high finish of a crack North Country choir, but, short of this, it was excellent.'

—Yours, &c., PERCY A. SCHOLES.

[We gladly print Mr. Scholes's letter, the more so as it confirms our point, which was the absence of any basis of comparison between a crack North Country choir and a few undergraduates singing together as a vacation hobby.—EDITOR.]

BRITISH EMPIRE MUSICAL FESTIVAL

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me to announce in your columns my withdrawal as one of the adjudicators in the Church Organ section of the British Empire Musical Festival. I do not consider the special connection of any trading firm with this competition places it on a sufficiently broad basis.—Yours, &c., A. EAGLEFIELD-HULL.

GIBBONS IN D MINOR

SIR,—Apropos of the Gibbons Tercentenary, I write to point out that one of the finest of all Gibbons's works—the Evening Service in D minor—was overlooked in most quarters. The work was discussed in your columns in July, 1915. Its omission from the octavo series of the Tudor Music Committee is curious and regrettable. Fortunately an edition is available—that of Mr. Royle Shore, published by Novello a few years ago (transposed to F minor, with English and [adapted] Latin words).—Yours, &c.,

Finchley, N. 'TUDOR.'

LABOUR CHOIRS: CONDUCTORS WANTED

SIR,—The London Labour Choral Union ventures to ask that you will give us the hospitality of a short space in your columns with a view to making an appeal for the voluntary services of qualified choir conductors.

Quite apart from Party considerations, we feel that all music-lovers will applaud our efforts to spread a love of choral music throughout the organized Labour movement.

The work which the London Labour Choral Union has done under the able leadership of Mr. Rutland Boughton has produced a marked stimulus in musical appreciation by the working-class movement in London. The Union is a federation of local Labour and Co-operative choirs, and seeks to improve the quality of the existing choirs, to organize massed concerts from time to time, and, by no means the least important, to establish new local Labour choirs.

In readiness for the early autumn, we are planning a campaign for the establishment of a considerable number of new local Labour choirs in various areas in Greater London. Our greatest difficulty, however, is in securing the voluntary services of competent conductors. Clearly the solution of this problem is an essential pre-requisite of the effort contemplated.

We shall, therefore, be glad to hear from any of your readers who are qualified for and sympathetic with the work in hand, and it will be useful if, in writing, they will indicate the area or areas for which they have a preference. No lover of music could render greater service to this art than to respond to the appeal made in this communication.

—Yours, &c., HERBERT MORRISON.

'THE MALADY OF CHOPIN'

SIR,—It is somewhat strange that I had just finished the draft of an article on 'Musical Highbrows,' both critics and composers, which I meant to submit for your consideration, when I took up the Musical Times for June (I have read this journal for forty-five years) and my eye lighted on the article by Mr. Erik Brewerton entitled 'The Malady of Chopin.'

The article proved a most interesting one, and I felt I should like to have a long talk with Mr. Brewerton on the subject. This, however, is impossible; but I wish to call attention to the last sentence of the article where the writer asks:

> 'Can it be that to the fastidious Chopin some secret was withheld which was revealed to the bourgeois Schubert; and can this have happened precisely because the one was fastidious and lived in salons and the other was bourgeois and drank beer?'

This was the very question I had endeavoured to answer, not with reference to Chopin in particular, but with regard to musical 'highbrows,' whether critics or composers, in general.

The burden of my argument was that no one, however great his genius, can touch the human soul 'with fire as from the altar,' unless that individual is in personal touch with his fellows. He must mingle with human beings, take hard knocks, and strike in self-defence. He must realise other people's manifold trials and difficulties, and sympathise with their sorrows; help them in their weakness and ignorance; recognise their fortitude and endurance; 'rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep.' He must in short be a sentient, living human being, trying to see life whole, and not a small part of it. In the school of life he will learn more than all the academies in the world will teach him. Aloofness, the superior air, pride of intellect, the aristocratic spirit, are fatal to the development of the highest art, as all history proves.

In all probability Chopin's aristocratic instincts, feelings, and outlook on life account for the irritation and failure to satisfy to which Mr. Brewerton alludes, for the first rule of the aristocrat is to hide his emotion, never to give himself 'away,' and on no account to 'let himself go.' He is perennially engaged in hiding himself even from himself, and particularly from those about him. Schubert, being a 'plain man,' was untrammelled by any such rule or instinct. He was himself all the time—frank, open, generous. Chopin instinctively was withholding, reserving something; Schubert could not and did not withhold anything, because he mingled with his fellows, entered into their life, danced with them, played with them, sang with them, drank with them. Schubert was the counterpart of Robert Burns. Both had much in common—much that cannot be admired or held up as examples to follow, but their position in music and poetry respectively is due to the fact that both men were human to the marrow of their bones. Being human, each spoke to humanity in a language it understood and felt; and humanity immediately, unequivocally, and passionately responded.—Yours, &c.,

THOMAS MANSON.

'THE FUTURE OF PERFORMANCE'

SIR,—Mr. Cotton has written an admirably stimulating article in the Musical Times for June, and in the heat of the moment one quite longs for the speedy arrival of this musical Utopia, which he assures us is on the way. A little reflection, however, suffices for us to find the 'icy hand' of reason pulling us back to earth. In reality, this is a reductio ad absurdum of a partial truth.

In the first place, if there are to be no performances there will of course be no performers, as nobody would trouble to learn an instrument which he was never to be allowed to play. In that case, of course, it follows also that there would be a cessation in the manufacture of musical instruments. But this capacity for 'auralising' (horrid word) a score is solely gained by actual remembrance of sounds and effects heard in the past. Therefore it seems that in our Utopia we shall have to endure performances, after all, or else stand in danger of losing the very faculty which is to save us the price of so many tickets, not to mention programmes, cloak-room fees, and taxicab fares. After all, reading a score is in effect a 'Barmecide's Feast.' One can eat a dinner mentally by studying a menu (would the correct word here be 'gastricising'?) I am afraid such a meal would leave us rather hungry, despite the manifest advantages, such as absence of bad cooking, no waits between courses, no bill, and no tips!

Seriously this mental listening to music is symptomatic of the ultra-'highbrow' outlook on our glorious art which is doing so much to stifle appreciation of good music in some quarters. Anyhow, I know which of the two following things I would prefer: (a) reading through a Bach Organ Prelude, (b) playing it on a large organ in a fine stone church.

Again, is the number of first-rate score-readers very large? I personally consider myself quite a good hand at deciphering a score, but I should be unwilling to pass judgment on a strange composition which I had merely read on paper. I find most score-readers are taken at their own valuation because nobody can possibly tell whether or not they are accurately 'auralising' the music. Any composer will tell you that one of life's great moments is when he hears his own work played by a large orchestra under a good conductor.

Never mind, Mr. Cotton! Despite your article, I have no doubt that if I were to offer you tickets for the Three Choirs Festival . . . !—Yours, &c.,

S. W. OLIPHANT CHUCKERBUTTY.

THE MISUSE OF THE TROMBONE

SIR,—Without wishing to enter into any controversy, may I venture to suggest the possibility of Franck having intended valve trombones in his Symphony? This would mean that there would be no difficulty as regards the C flat and B flat in the first example of Mr. J. A. Westrup's interesting article.

René Brancour, in his 'Histoire des Instruments de Musique' (1921), says:

> 'The trombone with pistons, much employed in other countries—notably in Belgium—happily does not with us seem able to supplant the slide trombone.'

Now, I am not inclined to lay much stress on the fact that Franck was a Belgian by birth (he became a naturalised Frenchman in 1870), and therefore was more likely to be in touch with Belgian customs than the ordinary French composer. But the Symphony was written in 1886-88, and round about that time French orchestras seem to have coquetted with valve trombones of different makes. I heard 'Les Huguenots' at the Opéra in '86 and '87, and, unless my memory has played me false, on one of those occasions (if not both) there were piston trombones in the orchestra. And it is significant that d'Indy for 'Fervaal' (1895) particularly specifies his four tenor trombones as being à coulisse. Surely he, more methodical than many of his contemporaries, would not have given a direction that would be totally unnecessary, if all French orchestras from time immemorial had adhered rigidly to the slide instrument? Previously, in 'Le Chant de la Cloche' (1885), he had employed two trombones with six pistons in addition to the three (unspecified) ones of the orchestra.

Composers are apt to be much like children with a new toy. They come across a make of instrument that squeaks or grunts a note higher or lower than the normal, and they promptly utilise it, without stopping to consider whether that particular note is likely to become a permanency of the orchestral scale. I have little doubt that when Sir Henry Wood introduced trombones with independent pistons into his orchestra, some composers determined to exploit their possibilities.

Perhaps some Franckian can throw light on the subject. I have merely made my suggestion to 'save the face' of the genial organist. But of course on certain technical details any composer is liable to err. Is the following, in fairly rapid time, suitable to a slide tenor trombone?

(The initial tempo is ¢ Modéré, but for this passage it is Beaucoup plus animé.) It comes from the Suite from Bruneau's 'L'Attaque du Moulin' (1893), and, if it yearns for a valve instrument for its proper interpretation, rather points to the fact that piston trombones were not unknown at the Opéra-Comique some thirty years ago.—Yours, &c.,

TOM S. WOTTON.

SIR,—In the June issue of the Musical Times, Mr. Westrup writes an article on 'The Misuse of the Trombone'; an admirable article, in which there is nothing to quarrel with so long as Mr. Westrup keeps to his subject. But in an article on the misuse of the trombone, abuse of the clarinet should not, I feel, have any part. Mr. Westrup's words about the clarinet merely prove that he marches with the times, and is a prey to that very irreverence which he himself appears to deplore, for at the beginning of his article he says 'We live in an irreverent age.' To talk in mixed metaphor of 'the aristocracy which was the strong pillar of our forefathers, being now compelled to cut capers worthy only of the clarinet' is nothing short of irreverence to that beautiful instrument which among the wood-wind holds the same priority which Mr. Westrup gives to the trombone over the brass. What troubles me is, what exactly are the capers referred to?

If Mr. Westrup means that the trombone has now to play passages which should have been scored for the clarinet, then none of his quotations bear this out, as all might equally well have been scored for most other instruments in the orchestra—that is, of course, after transposition, which would be necessary for the clarinet no less than any other instrument. Then why drag in the poor clarinet?

If, on the other hand, he wishes to say that the clarinet alone is worthy to and does cut capers—that is, according his analogy, plays passages not properly within its normal compass, I beg to differ once more. The clarinet is seldom written for except on its best notes. Downwards there is no limit to its good notes, as the lowest possible is one of the best sounding, and the high notes written for it seldom go above G in alt, and not often as high as that in orchestral works, though it is possible to reach the C above.

The only other alternative seems to be that Mr. Westrup considers anything played by a clarinet to be a caper compared to the staid, majestic tones of the trombone.

A caper is essentially a thing of movement and agility, and as a violin or practically any stringed instrument performs these antics with twice the facility and agility of a clarinet, presumably to Mr. Westrup among his trombones, the violin must appear at times to stand on its head.—Yours, &c.,

H. A. LAWRENCE.

Earlswood Mount,
Surrey.

SIR,—Mr. J. A. Westrup, in your June issue, mentions among his main points to be observed when writing for the trombone, that:

> 'Passages in which the slide has to travel such a distance as to render tone production impossible should not be written.'

He finds fault with Franck's trombone writing on this ground. But did Franck write for the slide trombone?

I have attended many Concours in Belgium, and have yet to make acquaintance with the slide trombone on those occasions.

On raising this question with Continental trombone players, I have been informed that valve trombones have generally ousted slide instruments; and they regard England as very behindhand in thus hanging on to the conservative type of instrument.

The valve trombone has at least one merit, i.e., freedom from slithering up to the note in the horrible way beloved by the purveyors of jazz noises.

So perhaps César Franck's writing may be doubly justified.
—Yours, &c.,

J. H. REGINALD DIXON.

OLD ENGLISH VIRGINALS

SIR,—May I ask the help which probably the Musical Times alone can give?

At the Special Exhibition of Ancient Musical Instruments held at South Kensington Museum in 1872, a virginal by Thomas White, dated 1653, was shown by Samuel H. Gell, of Nottingham. It also bore the inscription 'Mary Bayard,' and inside the lid there was a painting in tempera of Orpheus charming the animals with his lyre, as in the virginal (also by Thomas White, but dated 1664) formerly in the Boddington (Kendrick Pyne) Collection, and now the property of the Hon. F. G. Wynn. Mr. Gell, I believe, died about twenty years ago, but inquiries at Nottingham have failed to locate his instrument.

I am compiling a list of these rare examples of 17th-century workmanship for the new edition of Grove's 'Dictionary of Music,' and have noted twelve specimens ranging from 1641 to 1675. Perhaps I may explain that the case of the English virginals is almost always of oak, and in shape is similar to the early so-called 'square' pianoforte, averaging 5-ft. 6-in. in length, and 1-ft. 8-in. in width. The lid is domed instead of flat, and, of course, there are 'jacks' instead of hammers. If complete, it is on a four-legged stand. Inside there is a lavish display of painting, and of gilding on embossed pasteboard.

If any of your readers can help me to discover the late Samuel Gell's virginal, or can tell me on a post-card of the whereabouts of any similar instrument, I shall be most grateful, even though I may have already noted the example.
—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS W. GALPIN.

CHOIRBOYS AND SCOUTS

SIR,—With reference to the letter signed 'Choirmaster,' in your June issue, on the above subject, pray allow me to set your correspondent's fears at rest. An urgent appeal to encourage Boy Scouts to become choirboys was addressed by me some months ago, immediately after my appointment as Commissioner for Music, to The Scout (the paper specially intended for Scout-masters, &c.) I have also written articles on the same subject in the boy's paper, The Scout.

I am making this rapprochement between choirs and Scouts one of the main features in my policy. There is need for co-operation and for mutual help, and overtures should be made on both sides. I am already hearing of several cases where such co-operation is at work and producing the happiest results, and I shall be glad to hear of further cases where choir-work is regarded as a definite department of scouting, and scouting is closely connected with choirs. The experience of those concerned would be most helpful in furthering what I am sure is a scheme capable of the happiest results.—Yours, &c.,

Westminster Abbey.
June, 1925.

SYDNEY H. NICHOLSON
(Commissioner for Music, Boy Scouts' Association).

SIR,—It was with considerable interest that I read Mr. Nicholson's letter with reference to encouraging choirboys to become Boy Scouts. The opinion of a man in the position of Mr. Nicholson naturally commands respect, but at the same time one often wonders whether the difficulties of the average Church organist are fully realised by men at the head of the profession. For example, the late Sir George Martin, in his book on 'Choir-Training,' directs choirmasters to prevent their boys from shouting in the street. How is it to be done?

If Mr. Nicholson will allow me, I should like to ask him he following questions:

(1) Are the Abbey boys allowed to become Scouts, and if so, how many are Scouts?
(2) Are the Abbey boys allowed to take part in the Scouts' 'sing-songs'?
(3) Three of my boys asked leave of absence on Whit-Sunday to attend the Scout camp. Would Mr. Nicholson have granted it? (I did so, but under protest.)
(4) Having regard to the above question, would Mr. Nicholson, if he were me, encourage my other seventeen boys to become Scouts, and, if so, would he sing a series of solos accompanied by himself (with 'men'obbligato) at the festival services?
(5) The Scouts' drill necessitates absence from choir practice (I'll own that we practise every night). Would Mr. Nicholson still encourage boys to join?

—Yours, &c.,

W. J. FREDERICK PUGH.

34, Wilmington Avenue, Chiswick, W.4.

Mr. Nicholson replies to the above queries:

'All the Abbey choir-boys are Scouts, and form their own Troop (30th Westminster).

'The solution of the difficulties mentioned lies in co-operation. If all or the majority of the choir-boys became Scouts, they could form separate patrols (or even a separate Troop), and special arrangements could be made for them. It is often difficult to do this for a few only. Certainly choir duties should come first—the first promise of a Scout is to try to do his duty to God. Even choir-boys deserve holidays, though obviously these should not coincide with Church festivals. Question (4) is not sufficiently clear for me to attempt to answer.'

SIR,—May I, as a scout-master, be allowed to reply to 'Choirmaster,' in your June number?

In answer to a letter appealing to choirmasters to persuade their choir-boys to become Boy Scouts, he says:

> 'It will be interesting to know whether an equivalent appeal of equal weight has been issued to scout-masters urging them to induce Boy Scouts to join Church choirs.'

And further, that:

> 'It seems reasonable that this point should be cleared up before any action is taken by choirmasters on the lines indicated.'

This attitude seems to be both illogical and one-sided. 'Choirmaster' seems entirely to misunderstand the reason for persuading choristers to become Scouts. We do not ask this favour for the good of the scout-master, nor yet for the good of the troop, but for the good of the boy. On the other hand, if we scout-masters are to persuade our Scouts to join choirs, it will obviously be for the choir's good, and not for the boys'. It is, therefore, unreasonable of 'Choirmaster' to demand the latter before he will consent to the former.

Lastly, from my own knowledge of choirboys, it seems that they are often more in need than the ordinary boy of the healthy spirit and self-discipline that scouting so inimitably teaches. For this reason, if for no other, I hope that 'Choirmaster' will withdraw his opposition.—Yours, &c., ERIC J. N. BRAMALL.

St. John's College, Oxford.

'SOMEWHERE FARTHER NORTH'

SIR,—'Feste's' remarks in the June issue of the Musical Times regarding the performance of 'The Apostles' by the Alexandra Palace and Wolverhampton joint choirs are very much to the point.

I was a member of the audience on that occasion, and assure you that the Wolverhampton critic you quote is not quite fair in laying the blame for the lightness of the leads on either Mr. Allen Gill or his choir.

The opinion I formed was that few of the Wolverhampton Choir read music and are, therefore, compelled to rely on their more gifted members for their cue, consequently the singing was lacking in that crispness which was so enjoyable in the performances of Bach's Mass in B minor and 'The Dream of Gerontius' given by the Alexandra Palace Choir in February and March.

In case any may accuse me of partisanship, I would say I hail from Sheffield, and am more likely, therefore, to favour the Midland choir than the London one, but the narrowness and bad sportsmanship of the Wolverhampton critic will be annoying to all music-lovers, more especially as such statements are not borne out by facts.

Mr. Gill is to be applauded for the admirable way in which he allows for the wretched acoustics of the Alexandra Palace.—Yours, &c., 'TYKE.'

THE REGENT'S BUGLE

SIR,—Mr. Blandford may be interested to know that the 'Regent's Bugle' was but a variant of the 'Royal Kent Bugle' (so-called in honour of H.R.H. the Duke of Kent) invented in 1809 by an Irishman, Joseph Halliday, bandmaster of the Cavan Militia, who patented it in 1810. Various forms of Halliday's invention were manufactured between the years 1812 and 1820, and evidently the 'Regent's Bugle' was called in honour of the Prince Regent.

James Power, 34, Strand, London, an Irishman, and a manufacturer of brass instruments, was also a music publisher (he published Moore's immortal 'Irish Melodies').

No doubt the spring-box marked 'Kent' was part of the mechanism in the 'Kent' bugle.

Mr. Blandford says that 'Percival and Power appear to be otherwise unknown as instrument makers; the latter was probably a silversmith only.' Reference to Pigot's Directory of 1824 gives us Percival's name as 'Musical Instrument Maker,' thus:

> 'Percival, Thomas, Horn and Trumpet, 89,
> St. James's Street.'

Percival, it may be added, merely copied from Halliday, as also did Distin, who played on a Royal Kent bugle at the grand review at Paris, with the band of the Grenadier Guards. This Kent bugle was manufactured by Matthew Pace, of Henry Street, Dublin, in 1812, and a replica of it (manufactured by Halliday) was presented to the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia by Distin in 1816.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

A REMARKABLE RECORD

Experienced musician seeks good accompanist (gentleman). S.E. district.—M. A. G., c/o Musical Times.

Baritone wishes to meet accompanist for mutual practice. —S. HUNT, 31, Agincourt Road, Hampstead, N.W.3.

Lady would give services as accompanist for practice. Croydon-Purley district.—C. T., c/o Musical Times.

Violin and viola players wish to meet another violin and 'cello for quartet practice of classical works. Leeds. —VIOLA, c/o Musical Times.

Australian gentleman wishes to exchange musical and choral programmes with London concert-goers.—W. ADAM, 'Mascotte,' Bardwell Road, Mosman, Sydney, N.S.W., Australia.

The Butterworth Rembrandt Orchestra would welcome lady instrumentalists.—55, High Street, Wandsworth, S.W.18.

Young conductor (five years' experience in operatic and orchestral performance) wishes to fill spare evenings assisting any keen musical society in London or Surrey.—CONDUCTOR, 22, Chivalry Road, Wandsworth, S.W.18.

Vocal quartet and string players required for ensemble practice. Good players and classical music. Manchester district.—PIANO, c/o Musical Times.

Bass wishes to visit good accompanist (lady or gentleman) for mutual practice of high-class songs. S.W. district.—T. R., c/o Musical Times.

Good 'cellist wanted for trios, &c. Windsor district. Good reader.—D. A., c/o Musical Times.

Amateur instrumentalists, all parts, required for orchestra at Northampton. Rehearsals, Fridays.—H. E. L., 161, Southampton Road, Northampton.

Vocalists wish to meet good pianists (earnest students preferred) for practice and accompanying. Weekly meetings. London, W. district.—DIPLOMAS, c/o Musical Times.

Peel Orchestra has vacancies for wood-wind and 'cellos. First-class library. Particulars of membership from Hon. secretary, George E. BARBER, 19, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.1.

Clarinet player (beginner) wishes to meet another in Manchester district for mutual practice.—W. O., c/o Musical Times.

String players wanted on Sunday mornings at West London Church. Classical Masses. Excellent experience.—ORGANIST, Holy Innocents', Hammersmith, W.6.

Lady (amateur violinist), wishing to make progress, would like to meet pianist or violinist, or both, for mutual practice. Birmingham district.—MUSIC, c/o Musical Times.

Mezzo-soprano wishes to meet good accompanist for practice, one evening a week.—B. S., 22, St. Mark's Crescent, Regent's Park, N.W.1.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

At the practice concert on May 25 the principal, Mr. J. B. McEwen, during the interval, gave a short address with the attractive title 'Ability and Disability.' It was full of sound advice pleasantly propounded to students who are leaving at the close of the term full of anticipation and enthusiasm at their coming advent in the greater world of life and music, and many of the maxims were well worth the careful consideration of those who have left their student's days far behind.

The outstanding feature of the students' chamber concert on May 25 was the excellence of the playing in a string quintet and quartet. In Mozart's Quintet in C the ensemble was quite exceptional, and the quality of the tone extremely good; indeed, it is quite just to say that the performance all round was on a high artistic level. Most attractive too were 'Sally in our Alley' and 'Molly on the Shore,' both played with a real understanding of the pieces. Mr. Jean Pougnet, the leader in each instance, is to be congratulated; incidentally, this promising young violinist appeared with much success at a recital at Wigmore Hall on June 3. He has fine technique, but plays with the utmost sensitiveness and feeling, but should be careful not to succumb overmuch to sweetness.

At the succeeding concert, a fortnight later, a pleasant reading was given of the first movement of Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4. Here and there a slight tendency to over-emphasise accents was noticeable, but generally speaking the performance was admirable. Mr. Ithali Mack showed a good deal of taste in two pianoforte pieces by Brahms, and Miss Joan Morris sang in pleasing and simple fashion Wolf's 'Verborghenheit.' This young vocalist has a voice of distinctly good quality that promises well. Good French pronunciation is rare among singers, be they students or full-fledged, but it was a decided feature of Mr. Dudley White's performance of Massenet's 'Vision fugitive,' a satisfactory state of affairs probably due to his mentor, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly. An interesting performance was given of Saint-Saëns's 'Fantaise' for violin and harp, and the harpist, despite occasional lack of intonation in the uppermost strings, should do well. Good diction, an invaluable asset to a singer, and clear signs of imagination were shown by Miss Anna Hubble in two songs by Herbert Hughes.

On Tuesday afternoon, June 16, Queen's Hall was decoratively garbed, the occasion being the students' orchestral concert. Sir Henry Wood prophesied rightly when he anticipated some really good playing, and the performance of the second, third, and last movements of the fifth Tchaikovsky Symphony was quite out of the common and marked a great advance on previous efforts; it was satisfactory to hear the refinement of the strings. The young conductor, Mr. Guy Baron, who took charge of the last movement, may be congratulated, and will do even better when he has co-ordinated his ideas on the building up of climaxes. Mr. Jean Pougnet played the Glazounov Violin Concerto with taste and feeling, and here again the orchestra displayed unusual discretion in the accompaniments.

It is of interest to know that the principal, Mr. J. B. McEwen, looking through a lot of music in the Academy Library, a storehouse of treasures, discovered five string quartets by Rossini. We all know Rossini the opera composer, but few realised that he ever indulged in such dissipation as chamber music. The quartets were written for Lord Burghersh, afterwards Earl of Westmorland, the founder of the Academy, and apparently have never been played, for there are no marks of expression. One of them, in G major, will receive a performance at a students' concert.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

Three orchestral concerts were given during June, that of the 'first' orchestra being, perhaps, the most important. The programme was on a large scale, and included Elgar's Violoncello Concerto, Delius's Pianoforte Concerto, Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Coq d'Or' Suite, and a scene from 'Aïda.' The soloists were Miss Ida Starkie, who boldly tackled the Violoncello Concerto at short notice with much success; Miss Bisset, whose reading of the Delius had many fine moments, despite an occasional lack of elasticity; and Miss Avis Phillips, who sailed through 'Ritorna vincitor' with all the confidence of an old hand. The 'Coq d'Or' Suite proved immensely popular, and one could well understand the success of the opera with the children of the North of England, who, we are told, chose this work from all the British National Opera Company's répertoire. The second orchestral concert afforded many opportunities for conductors in orchestral works, vocal solos, and concertos, and included a performance, under Dr. Malcolm Sargent's direction, of Beethoven's eighth Symphony.

The second Patrons' Fund Rehearsal of the term introduced four soloists who had been trained privately, Mr. Geoffrey Tankard performing the Grieg Pianoforte Concerto, Miss Katharine Stewart the Agnus Dei from Bach's B minor Mass, and Miss Lilly Phillips and Miss Vyvyan Lewis (violoncellists) playing the d'Albert Concerto and the Boëllmann Variations.

GIBBONS TERCENTENARY

We have received so many programmes of Gibbons Tercentenary celebrations that we can insert them only in condensed form:

At Bristol (May 5) the Madrigal Society joined the Cathedral Choir in the Te Deum, and ten anthems, four of which were accompanied by a small string orchestra. Dr. Basil Harwood played on the organ Fantasias in D minor and C, a Fancy for double organ, and the Fantazia of Foure Parts.

At St. Mary's Cathedral, GLASGOW (May 25), Mr. John Pullein gave an organ recital, playing a Voluntary in D minor, Ayre, Courante Cromatique, three Allmans, Fantasias in C and A minor, Galliard, and a Fancy for double organ. The Cathedral Choir sang six anthems.

At ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL (June 8), the selection comprised the Magnificat in F and seven anthems. The Spencer Dyke String Quartet and a small string orchestra from the Royal Academy of Music played Fantasias, and accompanied certain of the anthems; and some Voluntaries of Gibbons were played on the organ.

At HEREFORD, the Cathedral Choir sang on June 5 and on subsequent days eleven anthems and the Service in F; also the Voluntaries in A minor and D minor were played. On June 14 the Precentor preached a special sermon on Gibbons's life and influence.

At the celebration in CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL (June 5) the Cathedral Choir and the Choir from the Chapel Royal joined forces, the service being ordinary evening prayer, with the anthems 'Almighty and everlasting God,' 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' and 'O clap your hands.' The choir then proceeded to Gibbons's monument, where a special hymn was sung to his tune 'Canterbury.' The Voluntaries were by Gibbons. (This service was broadcast.)

The CAMBRIDGE University Musical Society celebrated the event in King's College Chapel on May 31 (Whit-Sunday), singing four anthems and five motets; Mr. Bernhard Ord played two groups of pieces on a harpsichord, and five pieces for strings were also included. Dr. Cyril Rootham conducted.

At NEWCASTLE CATHEDRAL (June 15), the choir sang at Matins the anthem 'Great Lord of Lords' and the Te Deum in F, and at Evensong the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F; and four anthems. On the following day a special musical service was held, the programme being made up of seven anthems, eight Fantasias for strings, and two Organ Voluntaries. It should be added that the programme contained, in addition to notes on some of the works performed, a chronological list of the chief events in Gibbons's life, a summary of his compositions, and a bibliography of the Tudor period.

At INVERNESS CATHEDRAL (June 5) the event was celebrated by a programme of music chiefly by Gibbons and his contemporaries, with some later organ items by Thomas Adams, John Stanley, and Stanford (Prelude on Gibbons's 'Angel's Song').

At SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL (June 15), Evensong was sung to Gibbons in F, after which a recital of his choral and organ music was given, along with an address by the Rev. Dr. E. H. Fellowes.

At LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL (June 5), a special Evensong was sung, the music comprising the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in D minor, 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' and several of Gibbons's hymn-tunes.

At NEWBURY Parish Church (June 6), under the auspices of the Berkshire Organists' Association, a special service was held—Evensong with music by Gibbons, and an organ recital by Mr. B. Ramsay, who played three pieces by Gibbons and Stanford's Three Preludes on Gibbons's Tunes (Song 22, Song 24, and Song 34).

The ORIANA SINGERS gave a Tercentenary Concert at Æolian Hall (June 5), singing six anthems and four madrigals. Mr. Charles Woolhouse led a string sextet in three string pieces, and Mr. Bernhard Ord gave two groups of harpsichord pieces. Mr. C. Kennedy Scott conducted.

At TRURO (June 9), a special service was held in the Cathedral, the music-list including three anthems, two organ voluntaries, two string pieces, and a hymn-tune by Gibbons; also the Byrd Sestet for strings.

At many churches the Tercentenary has been observed by the inclusion of a work by Gibbons in the service lists of a period spread over several weeks.

Now that the celebration is over it is to be hoped that Gibbons's memory will be kept green by a regular inclusion of his best work in the music-lists of cathedrals and churches. Commemorative programmes are apt to include some items that are not in the first flight, and there is the further drawback that a recital consisting entirely of works by Gibbons or any other composer of the period is likely to become monotonous; it may repel rather than attract the average listener. Such music has its best chance of due preparation by the choir, and of appreciation on the part of the listener, when it takes its place in the music-lists as a regular constituent.

COVENT GARDEN OPERA

THE GERMAN SEASON

The international season at Covent Garden began with a month of German opera—Wagner and Strauss. The latter's 'Rosenkavalier' set the ball rolling on May 8.

When this piece was revived last year Londoners had generally forgotten what a good entertainment it is. So much of Strauss falls flat nowadays, but not this elaborate baroque musical comedy, which contains action, tunes, spectacle, and every chance for the display of good voices and amusing acting. The one thing against the opera is its enormous length; but as a set-off against that was the excellence, indeed the positive brilliance, of the performance, by the same artists (mostly Viennese) as last year. 'Rosenkavalier' is a 'period piece,' and that is indeed enough to attract an age in which every one collects. Hofmannsthal's libretto is a little museum of 18th-century Viennisms. It is licentious, but in that it does not quarrel with the tastes of 1925. Strauss's music does not, of course, belong to the period, but it nevertheless matches extraordinarily well: for the art of Richard Strauss—sumptuous and gaudy, amusing, extravagant, and grossly frivolous—is in the very spirit of the baroque period. It is Wagnerism in decadence, but let us not be so priggish as to deny the charm of the arts of the decadent periods. Only too much of it can be a bore, and we are glad that not all the churches at Venice are Jesuit churches, and that there are tombs of earlier doges than John Pesaro, in the Frari. When the time comes—long distant, we all hope—for the building of Strauss's funerary monument, that monstrous tomb, or Bertuccio Falier's, will be a suitable model.

As an example of a misapplication of the baroque style we were given this season, after a lapse of many years, 'Elektra.' Here the extraordinary wastefulness of the means employed made a depressing effect. There are moments in which it was indicated that Strauss, if he had not been distracted by an itch to assert the very vulgarest sensationalism, could possibly have written a good 'Elektra.' But the thing as it stands is really bad. Here Strauss took the wrong turning, and it is a pity some friend could not have told him so before he began his half-crazy labours on the subject. It was the wrong subject for him, for the only sort of subject with which Strauss really is safe is one which allows of rather brutal splendours, and excuses by its own nature any lapses of taste. 'Elektra' with its flux of yearning music and its crazy din, comes near the ridiculous.

Both these operas were conducted by Bruno Walter, who had a magnificent orchestra under him. The first performance of 'Rosenkavalier' had not quite the fine finish of last year's, but nevertheless so beautiful an accomplishment is rare in any opera-house. The women were Mesdames Lotte Lehmann, Delia Reinhardt, and Elisabeth Schumann, and the matchless picture of the abominable old baron was again due to that ripe artist, Richard Mayr.

Madame Gertrud Kappel sang as Elektra. She had evidently decided not to damage her larynx for the sake of an ephemeral sensation, and who can blame her? Madame Olczewska sang as Clytemnestra—an extremely clever performance on the approved lines, no doubt, the House of Atreus having been moved to Vienna and turned into an institute for diseased lunatics. She looked frightful, did this normally pleasing person, and uttered frightful whoops of demented laughter.

WAGNER

Of 'The Ring' we were given no more than 'The Valkyrie,' but to make up there was a revival of 'The Mastersingers,' always a gigantic undertaking, and also of 'Lohengrin' and 'The Flying Dutchman,' all of them operas difficult to produce by a company so hastily assembled and so soon to be dispersed. 'Tristan,' which was the first Wagnerian opera of the season, is an easier enterprise, when you have engaged the two best singers and the best conductor and orchestra available.

This 'Tristan' was rather unlucky, in spite of Bruno Walter, and of unusually strong artists in the secondary parts (Mayr, a wonderfully interesting Mark; Madame Olczewska, an original and vivid Brangäne; Friedrich Schorr, a powerful Kurwenal). The Isolde (Madame Kappel) was certainly competent; but the Tristan was a complete fiasco. As he was afterwards reported indisposed, and was seen no more, there is no need to name him.

The inferiority of the German tenors was indeed a peculiarity which did not diminish as the season went on. In 'Lohengrin,' by the side of the moving Elsa of Madame Lehmann—as beautifully composed as any operatic representation of our day—there was the disillusionment of a hopelessly prosaic tenor (Fritz Perron), a singer who for the expression of romantic wonder offered the substitute of a glassy self-complaisance. Vocally he got through the part decently, though his tone was never far from a nasal twang, but it was not singing in which one could take pleasure for its own sake.

Then in 'The Valkyrie' an acquaintance of last year reappeared in the Siegmund of Fritz Soot. A certain awkward exaggeration in his first entrance as the wounded hero made a jarring effect, and in spite of good intentions this Siegmund was never quite good enough. Mr. Soot's best effort was in the little tenor part in 'The Flying Dutchman,' in which he could properly bluster without need of any of the refinements. But again as Walther in 'The Mastersingers' his well-meaning, but undistinguished, presence was detrimental. Better Walthers than he have found it difficult to avoid the appearance of fatuity in some moments. This Walther was unaware of the danger. At a later performance a newcomer, Adolf Lussmann, was tried—a respectable singer, but not of an eminent rank, lacking the vocal style to do justice to Walther's music.

'Lohengrin' and 'The Mastersingers' both deserve a new Covent Garden dress; but the enterprise of performing them at all was, in the circumstances of 1925, considerable, so it would perhaps be unkind to insist that the grand scenes were a little dowdy. It could hardly be disguised that the chorus was a makeshift.

But there were delightful and memorable things. We shall not soon forget Pogner's speech to the Guild as uttered by the admirable Richard Mayr. What a model! With such an artist among them it is odd that these excellent German basses and bass-baritones are not still better. Every phrase of Mayr's is perfectly judged, and he finds no need to underline words by spitting or snarling—habits of some of the best of his colleagues.

Friedrich Schorr overdoes many initial consonants, and will upset the balance of a phrase to make sure that the slowest wits in the house have heard what he said. It is true that exaggerated consonants get their reward afterwards in the crush-room. 'How wonderfully clearly these German singers pronounce their words!' say those who seem to like to have words thrown at them like stones within a snowball. Mr. Schorr's Wotan was, all the same, very noble and rich. His Sachs received many compliments, but it was disappointing if one looked for a distinguished Sachs. This one was a petty burgess with all the rest of the Guild. A great Sachs convinces us that the people are right when they single him out for special homage. This Sachs was, to start with, obviously ill at ease in an uncouth costume which certainly did not belong to him or the part. Now a Sachs who is ill at ease is an anomaly. Strong in his natural superiority, Sachs is always at ease. He faces with perfect equanimity both the spiteful Beckmesser and his social superior, the tiresome Walther. He is not flurried in his charming dignity—not even when Eva proposes to him. Well, this capital and worthy singer put in the place of the distinguished Sachs a commonplace, overdressed, and rather fussy person.

Now Eva was perfectly charming—or, rather, both Evas were. For first we saw Madame Lehmann, and a few days later Madame Schumann. German women singers are surely better than of old. Another was the Senta—Madame Frida Leider. She was an intense Senta. In fact, 'The Flying Dutchman' was generally taken with intensity. Every one but Daland (Mr. Mayr) was singing as though to impress on us that out of this innocent music all 'The Ring' was to come. Daland, of course, stood on one side, humorously not knowing a bit what all that solemnity was about. There was a fine, sombre Dutchman (E. Schipper, who also did well in other parts, such as Telramund).

Several other singers deserve a word, such as the clever Beckmesser (E. Habich), who is to be thanked for avoiding all superfluous fooling. The King in 'Lohengrin' (Otto Helgers) had a voice of huge volume, with which he was inclined to roar. Emanuel List was a useful Hunding. Madame Bella Paalen sang Magdalena and such-like parts uncommonly acceptably. A number of our B.N.O.C. singers had minor shares, including, in 'The Mastersingers' Messrs. William Anderson, Dennis Noble, Parry Jones, William Michael, and Philip Bertram.

One could not but be impressed by the assurance the German singers possessed in their knowledge of their parts. In this direction conscientious labour could not have gone farther. C.

Dr. Ernest Walker has resigned the direction of the Balliol Concerts, Oxford. He has managed these well-known music-makings for about twenty-five years—almost since their inception, for they were started by John Farmer thirty years ago. Dr. Walker's successor is Dr. W. H. Harris, of New College.

'HIAWATHA' AS OPERA

Half opera, half pageant, would be a better description of the recent Albert Hall performances of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha.' The dramatic quality was there, but necessarily some passages were of the nature of narrative. The chorus took a part in the scheme altogether disproportionate to what is usual in opera, and the movements of masses of people against a background of mountain scenery bulked largely in the impression made upon the audience.

Taking the chorus first (the Royal Choral Society) it may be said that their singing—dispersed as they were over the huge arena, and unprovided with music copies—was admirable. The Royal Albert Hall Orchestra, on the non-platform side of the arena, accompanied. Dr. Malcolm Sargent had the difficult task of conducting these forces, and carried it through very effectively (on two occasions Mr. H. L. Balfour conducted). The soloists were varied upon different occasions during the fortnight's daily performances. The Hiawathas were Horace Stevens, Frederick Taylor, and Harold Williams; the Minnehahas, Ruth Vincent, Phyllis Kelly, and Mavis Bennett; the Nokomises, Elizabeth Mellor, Anita Desmond, and Constance Groom; the Chibiaboses, Frank Webster, Horace Vincent, Hubert Carter, John Booth, William Boland, Edward Leer, and William Heseltine—and so on! One actual American Indian took part, Os-ke-non-ton, in the part of the Medicine man.

The production of such a huge display and the marshalling of the large forces was a great credit to Mr. T. C. Fairbairn. Some few changes and additions to the music of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy were needed, and these were undertaken by Mr. Fairbairn, Mr. H. Coleridge-Taylor, and Miss Kathleen Maxwell. It will be recalled that on a previous occasion 'Hiawatha' has been given in this form at the Albert Hall. P. A. S.

OXFORD:

CHRIST CHURCH QUATER-CENTENARY

From King Henry VIII. to Peter Warlock the path of music winds deviously for four centuries. Christ Church, Oxford, which celebrated its quater-centenary in June, reviewed the part it has played in British music by a concert in Eights Week (May 23), consisting entirely of music by musicians who were either connected with the Cathedral or were members of the College. Many famous names appeared in the programme, including the two already mentioned. Richard Edwardes was represented by his famous madrigal, 'In going to my naked bed,' and the less well-known 'By painted words.' Three of Giles Farnaby's harpsichord pieces were played on the pianoforte by Mr. C. V. Pilkington, a present undergraduate, and a Sonata of Dr. Crotch by Dr. Henry Ley, the present organist, who appeared also as a composer in the song, 'The Lake Isle of Innisfree.' Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, who re-established musical studies at Oxford and founded St. Michael's College, Tenbury, was a graduate of Christ Church. Dr. Corfe, Dr. Harford Lloyd, and Dr. Basil Harwood, were all organists of the Cathedral, and were represented in the programme, Dr. Harwood playing the pianoforte part in a Trio of which the violoncello part was played by his son, a present member of the House. The famous rounds, 'Great Tom is cast,' by Matthew White (1600-70) and 'O, the bonny Christ Church bells,' by Dean Aldrich (1647-1710), were unusual numbers in a concert programme. The last-named composer was the collector of the fine musical library which belongs to the College, and wrote an amusing Catch, sung with lighted pipes, called 'Ode to Tobacco.' All the performers were connected either with the Cathedral, the Choir School, or the College. Among the names which occur in the roll of Christ Church musicians, but did not appear in this particular programme of Christ Church music, are those of the late Gervase Elwes, Dr. Adrian C. Boult, and the Bishop of Ripon. F. S. H.

London Concerts

THREE COMPOSERS

Henry Eichheim, Ildebrando Pizzetti, and Maurice Ravel, took active part in the performances of their new compositions given at the American Women's Club at the invitation of Mrs. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, who had commissioned from each of them a piece of chamber music. Pizzetti, whose work was the first on the programme, provided a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello; Ravel a 'Chanson' for voice, pianoforte, flute, and 'cello; Eichheim some 'Oriental Impressions' for a small orchestra with a large percussion department. The choice of form and instruments is typical of each composer. Pizzetti's Trio expresses in a new idiom thoughts and ideas which have ever been connected with music. Ravel, in the 'Chanson,' dots the i's and crosses the t's of a somewhat childish text with great skill. Eichheim, whose 'Impressions' came last, is content with a traveller's tale—or rather a globe-trotter's—for his music does not breathe the spirit of adventure, of perils, of romance, but of robust health and of profound content.

Thus, in a way, we had the contest on the Wartburg enacted all over again by modern bards—the theme being chamber music. The Italian champion spoke for the old state of things, for law and order. He maintained that music means emotion, and that its value is to a large extent that of the depth and sincerity of the emotion. The conventions of form established by long custom are for him not a fashion that has gone, or a barricade to protect last-ditchers, but the outcome of development—something to be improved and enlarged, not to be swept away thoughtlessly. And he showed that it is still capable of being strengthened or, at least, modified, by calling to his aid the reserves of Italian folk-song—not 'Funiculi-funicula' (the characteristic Neapolitan canzonetta made in London), but real folk-song as old as the race, and perhaps older.

He was answered by the French champion, who held that one piece of music is as good as another, and perhaps a —— better. A song for your Trio, says M. Ravel in effect, and above all things let us have liberty. There must be liberty to do whatever one wishes, for the creator of music is above his time; liberty to choose any form, any medium; liberty to use music for the purposes of wit and satire; liberty to ignore her limitations, and to push on ahead at all cost. There must be no boasting on the part of consonances that a sense of rest and of conclusion is their privilege. Until this is recognised, he proposes that consonance be banished, and he concludes by maintaining that the only way to progress is to make the people 'sit up and take notice.'

After these two stalwart champions, the representative of young America seemed a little vague. His idea appeared to be that progress can be obtained by opening our mind to the impressions of foreign places and people, and travelling about—which in these days of conducted tours is not so difficult a matter as it was wont to be. Under the ægis of Dr. Lunn or Mr. Cook's sons, the gong of a Japanese temple will be associated with other spiritual exercises than grace before meat.

It need hardly be said that the competition was very interesting. Neither marks nor laurels were awarded to the winner, and every one of us went home sure that his particular favourite had come out top. B. V.

THE LATVIAN CHOIR

After the male-voice Cossacks, the mixed-voice Latvians, from Riga, where they have been trained by M. Theodore Reiters. This is no virtuoso instrument, but a gathering of human beings gifted with pleasant but by no means wonderful voices, and well instructed in choral ways and means. To use a homely comparison, they would figure with credit in the chief class at Blackpool, but to do so they would have to improve their repertory. Latvian composition—we heard the work of seven composers—is still working at the vein from which Smart and Leslie drew the ore. M.

E. J. MOERAN'S CONCERTS

Thanks to Mr. E. J. Moeran the last weeks of the spring musical season in London contained something worth hearing and discussing. Mr. Moeran's three chamber concerts at Wigmore Hall gave us the following works:

May 23.

Quartet ... ... Debussy
Pianoforte Quintet ... ... Arnold Bax
Quartet ... ... E. J. Moeran

June 7.

Motet for string quartet ... ... R. O. Morris
Fourth Quartet ... ... Bernard van Dieren
Song-cycle, 'The Curlew' ... Peter Warlock
Pastoral Fantasy for string quartet ... ... Arthur Benjamin

June 13.

Pianoforte Trio ... ... E. J. Moeran
Two Poems for violoncello and pianoforte ... ... Hugo Anson
Song-cycle on Poems of Thomas Hardy ... ... Hubert Foss
Pianoforte Trio ... ... John Ireland
Sociable songs, &c.

The Debussy Quartet is happily always with us. No doubt it was chosen for the sake of the Brussels Quartet, which deserved a fling on its own. Of all the other instrumental works the Quintet of Bax is the one that the present writer most desires to hear again. It was no less a problem for ear and mind than the other works, but it held the regard by its prominent leading ideas, by its positive language, and by seeming always to spring from something within itself. Luminous music, beside which the Quartet of Mr. Moeran shone with a pale light. Mr. Moeran has been accused often enough of his quasi-folk-song tunes and moods. They are nothing to his discredit. If they are the musical milieu in which his spirit floats, it is natural that his music should be infused with them. It is more important that the Quartet is thoroughly good quartet-writing. Curious that the Trio of the third concert was not good trio-writing. Approach to its music was barred by chords that ever grew rankly upon the pianoforte score. The listener was constantly being brought up against this barrier—this and a good deal of over-urgent writing for the strings—that made it difficult to get at the root of the music. Not all of the Trio was open to this complaint.

The Motet of R. O. Morris is so called because it borrows the idiom of classical counterpoint, and might just as well borrow one of its favourite titles. In this neat and pleasant work we can hear Mr. Morris dropping a hint: '16th-century counterpoint was never worked out to its destiny on instruments. Let us take it up where the 17th century dropped it. Here is a start, with a string quartet. Just a few quiet liberties are taken to set the ball rolling.' The Motet is understood to be one of three in which Mr. Morris proceeds on similar lines.

The toughest problem of these concerts was Bernard van Dieren's Quartet. The new counterpoint as devised by Mr. van Dieren has every good quality but beauty. The listener's appreciation of it depends on the readiness of the ear to dispense with the soft ways of Bach and Beethoven and to draw pleasure from strong lines and fine clashings. Mr. van Dieren puts the question more compellingly than most of the composers who are pursuing this new path of musical discovery. His asceticism goes so far as to banish the violoncello on account of its lusciousness and sentimentality, and to substitute the double-bass. But in any ordinary string quartet the violoncello is not wholly engaged in being voluptuous. It spends as much of its time in making chords or collections of sounds come roundly to the ear, and this it does far better than the double-bass, and quite unobtrusively enough.

'The Curlew' was thoroughly well performed by Mr. John Goss and a group of well-known string and wind players. It simply asked one to sit back and receive the impression of its exquisite melancholy half-tones and its art of vocal line. The Quartet of Mr. Benjamin was handily made, but not conclusive.

The third concert was a trial for Mark Tapleys. One could emerge jolly from a festival of King Lears, Götterdämmerungen, Edgar Allan Poe, and Bax Symphonies, for the seamy side is enjoyable when it is finely handled. But these three earnest young men were rummaging among dark things and had failed to make an artistic synthesis of their discoveries. Mr. Moeran's troubled elaborations were succeeded by Mr. Anson's acidities. These make original music, no doubt, but they hurt a little and remained too long. The hint of Eastern connections in the titles of the poems did not pull the whole effect together. Then came Mr. Foss, composer to Thomas Hardy, whom he treated a little cavalierly. His music was not an offer of artistic ensemble, but an offer to complete the dire pictures which Hardy had half-drawn. Hardy clothed his grim thoughts in beautiful language. Not so Mr. Foss, who tore the clothes from tragedy, and the flesh as well. Let music give us the inner spirit of a poem, but not the inner skeleton! A genius might persuade us to believe in X-ray music, but Mr. Foss's musical vision is not as yet sufficiently penetrating, which is no discredit to him. The Cathedral Male-Voice Quartet assisted Mr. John Goss in a difficult task. M.

THE PHILHARMONIC CHOIR

The Philharmonic Choir brought its season to an end on May 21 with a programme the like of which this choir, and this choir alone, gives us. It contained a new work—'St. Patrick's Breastplate,' by Arnold Bax—and a resuscitation—Sir George Henschel's Requiem Mass. Good material this, with a moral in its contrast. The dashing young cavalier and the wise old commander, the hare and the tortoise, if you like; you may draw what picture and what moral you please. It is certain that Mr. Bax's music was far the more 'attractive,' and that it would have done equally well for any other high-flown text, whether a Saint's creed (the Breastplate is the strength and protection of Christianity) or a heroic love-tale; and it is certain that the Requiem for orchestra, chorus, and four soloists was everything—in feeling, balanced form, instrumental and vocal style—that an exalted tradition asked of it.

Mr. Kennedy Scott conducted Mr. Bax's work and Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, sung by Miss Dorothy Helmrich. Sir George conducted his own music, at the age of seventy-five. How easily he asserted his wishes! How little fuss, and what authority! Will he come to Queen's Hall next season and give us, say, some Beethoven and Brahms? M.

THE LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The season of the London Symphony Orchestra's coming-of-age has brought compliment wrapped up in criticism. It has been asserted that with many of the Orchestra's best players engaged at Covent Garden the concerts at Queen's Hall have suffered, particularly in the quality of the wood-wind playing. The real London Symphony Orchestra, then, is unreplaceable.

This Orchestra may boast that it has known more conductors than any other and is ready to suffer them gladly. On May 25 it had M. Kussewitzky, an imperfect Mozartean in the G minor Symphony, a better servant of Beethoven in the Ninth. Four days later it was subject to M. Sokolov, of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, U.S.A., in Bach, Chausson, Stravinsky, Schubert, and Ravel, and to M. George Enesco in some bright orchestral scoring of his own. A week later, for M. Sokolov again, they straightened out the much contorted fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky and made what they could of a tedious and un-Virgilian 'Pagan Poem' (after Virgil) by Charles Martin Loeffler. M. Sokolov is not one of those tyrant conductors who take an orchestra where they will, nor is he one of those amenables who follow an orchestra. He hovers between the two, which must be a little unsettling.

Then came the anniversary concert, on June 9, under two conductors—Kussewitzky and Elgar. The programme was that which Richter conducted on June 9, 1904:

Overture—'Die Meistersinger'	Wagner
Suite in D	Bach
Overture—'The Magic Flute'	Mozart
'Enigma' Variations	Elgar
Hungarian Rhapsody in F	Liszt
Symphony in C minor	Beethoven

This is still a good programme. The concert was in the afternoon, and the orchestra, at full strength, played magnificently. As we go to press the Orchestra is being delivered into the hands of a lady—Miss Ethel Leginska.

THE CAPETOWN ORCHESTRA

It is distressing to hear that the Capetown Orchestra has greatly curtailed its stay in this country, and has returned home with a sense of defeat. Artistically there has certainly been no failure, and if financially there has been such, it has been due partly to the fact that in the heart of summer Londoners do not pine for orchestral concerts. They flock to opera because it is, roughly speaking, the only time opera is presented to them, but orchestral music they have had the opportunity for hearing during the long winter and spring, and they are little likely to crowd into orchestral concerts in late May and June, especially when the orchestra is a small one, and, however competent, certainly in no way superior to the orchestras they are accustomed to hear. If Mr. Heward had brought some novelty—say, an orchestra of Kaffirs and Basutos, playing some strange kind of African Jazz—he might have succeeded; but a small edition of a normal European orchestra could not be expected greatly to attract.

The orchestra, as heard in London, comprised forty-five players, all of them personally well-equipped and all of them very reponsive to their conductor's quiet but authoritative direction. The programmes given were eclectic, and included some music that is comparatively little heard. The programme of a concert at which the writer was present was as follows: 'Mastersingers' Overture, Wagner's 'Dreams,' a 'Fugue-Sonata' for strings by Victor Hely-Hutchinson, Franck's 'Les Eolides,' Dvorák's 'Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme,' Wolf's 'Italian Serenade,' Delius's 'On hearing the first Cuckoo in Spring' and 'Summer Night on the River,' and Haydn's third Symphony, in E flat.

This was a big afternoon's entertainment; too big, perhaps, for a normal audience, but its variety and the excellent playing it received did much to carry it through. The Æolian Hall is, however, too small for a force of forty-five. Inevitably the brass 'comes at one' there, and the finest blend is hardly possible. If the orchestra could have been heard in Queen's Hall it would have been a great advantage.

A few words must be said of the one absolute novelty of the programme—the 'Fugue-Sonata.' It consists of three movements, each of them a fugue. The contrast between the movements is sufficient, and the work does not pall. The first movement is vigorous, the second slow and expressive, and the last almost jocular. The whole experiment is very ingeniously and successfully carried out. Mr. Hely-Hutchinson is the son of a former Governor of the Cape. He was educated at Eton and the Royal College of Music, and is now a professor at the South African College of Music. Before he was in his tenth year he had published, with Messrs. Novello, a sixty-page volume of compositions of very varied character, a counterpart, in its way, of the volume of the compositions of the youthful Mozart, written at Chelsea during his visit to this country in 1764-65. SINGERS OF THE MONTH

Miss Ruby Helder, who sang at Wigmore Hall, is called a tenor, and so indeed she struck one. It was not a contralto voice. Shutting one's eyes, one could only imagine that a man was singing. This is a real oddity. Miss Helder has added to nature's peculiar gifts of compass and quality the typical mannerisms of a tenor. The programme was serious, but the musical interest could hardly survive against the freakishness of such a singularity.

Mr. Richard Crooks, a tenor new to London, excited lively hopes by his singing at Wigmore Hall. At times he used the lightly pencilled tone and the careful phrasing of a lyric singer. Then he would suddenly expand and warm to a truly dramatic style. His high notes are extremely fine—well-established and full of resonance. One felt he had instinctive breath control, but the middle of his voice needs much more development.

Mr. Mark Raphael, at Wigmore Hall, sang Roger Quilter's cycle, 'To Julia,' and some Schumann and Brahms. This singer is not one of those who attract notice by any aggressive display of natural gifts. He has hardly the means to do so, in the first place, and in the second he has the good taste not to try. Good taste is, indeed, his great merit, and it is manifest in his diction and in his sensitive gradations of tone. This quiet, pleasant art of his wins a sympathetic attention.

The soprano, Madame Dusolina Giannini, who was praised here last year, came back and sang again at Queen's Hall. Her voice is brighter and bigger, and her highest notes in particular better even than before. These top notes have a quality that give the ear a sensuous pleasure. The singer certainly did not begin her recital well, but she may have been nervous. She narrowed her vowels and repressed the flow of her phrases. With 'Non so più' she was herself; it was bewitchingly sung, and one's faith was restored. She calls herself a dramatic soprano. Is not this a mistake? When her singing flows in a light and seeming careless lyrical way she is at her best. She is at her least good when, with hunched shoulders and indifferent breath-control, she seeks to impart heavy dramatic emphasis.

Mr. John McCormack gave two Sunday afternoon concerts at the Albert Hall. Again we had to admire his very complete technics and his command over all shades of expression but the very fiercest. He is a specialist, and obviously a highly self-conscious specialist, in the art of uttering sweet sounds and elegant phrases. It is all too calculated to be able to thrill the listener, but it does eminently succeed in charming. He makes more of the 'ah' vowel than do most singers, and he never by any chance alters a double vowel. All his words, in all the languages he sings, are wonderfully clear, but it is obvious that Italian is his foundation. His Italian is more natural than his German or English. Indeed, his punctilious English sounds like that of a highly cultivated foreigner. His 'ee' is a shade too bright, and 'your' he makes 'yoor.' Mr. McCormack is above all a nearly faultless singer of small things. Exquisite, indeed, was his performance of Granville Bantock's setting of Blake's 'Never seek to tell thy love,' which probably sent many hundreds hurrying the next day to the music shops for the song. The programmes included a good deal of Irish folk-music, in which his compatriots much admire him—curiously, since his always elaborate and sophisticated style is not really the thing for folk-music. The programmes were good, and made one revise one's memory of Mr. McCormack as a mere singer of shop-ballads.

Miss Phyllis Archibald sang at Æolian Hall, and is to be congratulated on a great advance in her art. In operatic excerpts her big and beautiful tone had full play, and it is to be wished that she could make the operatic stage her career. At its highest emotional pitch the voice was never harsh, even though it was still at times a little unsteady.

Miss Dorothy Moulton, again, is a singer who has remarkably improved. At Æolian Hall she sang an admirably composed programme, and it was nearly as well interpreted as chosen. The singer's legato was much firmer, and her intonation practicably irreproachable. There were, too, various graphic little touches in her singing such as had not been observed before.

Miss Florence Easton (soprano) sang at Queen's Hall, and at once impressed by the rightness of her production. Her singing was a trifle inflexible in Mozart's 'Deh, vieni!' and in Brahms's 'Feldeinsamkeit' poetry was missed. But in Schumann, Wolf, and Strauss, she showed how well she could sing. Wolf's song about the mouse-trap was especially good—humorous and light. In ascending phrases, Miss Easton was inclined to press too heavily on her tone, with the result that the voice grew harder as it rose. In an English song we heard 'hond' for 'hand.' Her choice of modern English songs was poor. Miss Easton has been living in America. There, apparently, only the feeblest forms of modern English song-writing have penetrated.

Miss Dorothy Smithard gave a concert with orchestra (Sir Henry Wood's) at Queen's Hall. The interesting programme included some Wolf songs newly scored by Sir Henry. The singer is hardly yet up to such an occasion. She was no doubt nervous, but the fact remains that the scale of this concert was absurd for a beginner with a very small voice. Except in some of the smaller songs she was ineffective. Yet it is possible that in more intimate surroundings there would be something more to say for her. And when she has gone beyond her present stage of 'tightness' there may be found a voice more fitted to the Queen's Hall.

Competition Festival Record

MARKING SHEETS

Those who remember the bitter controversies raised by the systems of marking which prevailed before the British Federation of Competition Festivals took the matter in hand and provided a system conducive to the greatest good of the greatest number, will hesitate before re-opening the question. And, indeed, the systems evolved for vocal solos, instrumental solos, and vocal ensembles are all that could be wished, and have stood the test of experience well. The only marking sheet which I never see without misgivings, is that reserved for instrumental ensemble—orchestras and quartets. As a rule neither quartets nor orchestras include a pianoforte, yet under the heading of 'technique' the adjudicator has his attention drawn to the use and abuse of pedal. The sheet is used for instrumental trios or ensemble pieces, some of which may consist in part of players of wood-instruments. To them not one of the definitions of technique given by the sheet will apply, for these refer to bowing, fingering, and use of pedal. On the other hand, there is no means of discriminating between the three main branches of the orchestra—strings, wood, and brass. Such a plan answered well enough while orchestras consisted mainly of violinists; it does not answer in the case of a properly constituted orchestra such as we may meet with in time at all important festivals. It is with an eye to the future rather than to the present, that I would urge the necessity for reconsidering the present system of marks for instrumental ensemble. At present there seems to be an idea that orchestral players can be marked individually. Personally, I have never been able to follow the bowing and fingering of twenty or thirty players at one and the same time. And if I had succeeded in achieving such a feat I should not have known how to apportion due praise or blame. Surely not one of the subdivisions of technique meets the case. One cannot speak of the bowing and particularly of the 'fingering' of an orchestra, and convey a clear idea of his meaning.

On the other hand, there are lacunæ which ought to be filled. In the first place the correctness of the tempo should be acknowledged in the marking sheet. In the second, when there is a free choice of test-pieces, some marks ought to be given to competitors who submit to a more difficult test. These suggestions are not made with a view to adding to the many cares of the Federation, but rather to pave the way for future developments of orchestral competitions which so long have played so lamentably modest a part in our festivals. If my personal experience is at all reliable as an indication of the present trend of things, the day when orchestral classes will be worthy companions of the choral classes is not very far distant.

B. V.

The BRIGHTON Festival, to which short reference was made in our last issue, had a successful beginning on May 14-16. The three-days' syllabus was well supported, and the large staff of adjudicators heard performances of far more than a beginner's standard. The best of the mixed-voice choirs, Clifton Road Congregational Church Choir (Madame Bessie Wood), had already made a name outside Brighton. There is talk of a six-day Festival next year.

HULL.—This year's Festival (May 19-23) was marked by its extension to five days, the elimination of money-prizes, and numerical success except in the choral classes. The adjudicators, Mr. Hugh S. Roberton and Mr. Ernest Fowles, pronounced it an artistic success. Two male-voice choir classes, for tenor lead and alto lead, brought one entry each. Three choirs sang Bateson's 'Sister, awake,' Reckitt's Choral Society (Mr. Percival Leech) being first. Flottergate Choral Society, Grimsby, won the principal challenge shield, the tests for which were Purcell's 'Soul of the World' and Bairstow's 'The Dawn of Song.' About thirty schools were represented in folk-dancing, and about fifty in singing, and this was the best feature of the Festival. An impromptu gathering of conductors was formed by Mr. Roberton, who gave them a little demonstration, and suggested the formation of a conductors' club at Hull.

At LYTHAM (June 10-13) Bach's 'Be not afraid' was the test for the chief mixed-voice competition. Nine choirs, all of good standing, entered, and a magnificent massed performance was in prospect. Five of them failed to attend, but the others—Blackpool Glee and Madrigal (Mr. H. Whittaker), Blackpool Orpheus (Mr. J. S. Warburton), Todmorden Glee and Madrigal (Mr. J. Crowther), Accrington and Church Co-operative (Mr. J. Hallworth)—made an ample choir for the combined performance under Mr. Julius Harrison. In the competition they were placed in the above order. A fine assembly of male-voice choirs was headed by Manchester Orpheus Glee Society (Mr. G. S. Smith). Lytham upholds its twenty-five-year tradition as a choral centre.

The third NORFOLK Festival was held at Norwich on May 20-23. The entries have risen from 237 in 1923 to 525 this year—evidence of a widespread musical faculty that is still, probably, waiting to be fully revealed. A fair proportion of this entry list was represented by choirs. Thirty-six school choirs entered, and twenty-nine adult choirs. The proportion of pianists—over half the entries—was excessive. Vocal soloists numbered fifty-six. Dr. W. G. Whittaker said of the sopranos that they had 'sweetness and, generally speaking, a nice, smooth tone, but not resonance.' Conspicuous among the successes of the Festival were the playing of an amateur orchestra from Cromer and the singing of a male-voice choir from Lowestoft.

WHARFEDALE Festival, held at Ilkley, on May 20-23, was one of those that have agreed to the suggestion of the Federation and abolished money-prizes. First-, second-, and third-class certificates were awarded, and the winner announced. There was a considerable increase in the entries for string classes, solo and concerted. There were two string orchestras from Leeds, two from Bradford School, and two local orchestras. One class that gave particular enjoyment to all concerned was that for six-handed trios at the pianoforte, with an age limit of fifteen. As Mr. Geoffrey Shaw remarked, it was possible only to young people who took up little room. On the first day the winning choir was Cleckheaton Central (Mr. H. Bennett) in both mixed- and male-voice choirs.

At the PEOPLE'S PALACE, E. London, the eighteenth Festival occupied six evenings from May 12 to May 20, and two further evenings for rehearsal and concert. This Festival does not acknowledge the soloist, the nearest approach that it allows being a violin and pianoforte duet. Vocal trios and quartets offer a very popular form of competition, and one that seems to be encouraged and fostered among the members of choral societies. Thus All Hallows' Church Fellowship Choir, from the East India Docks district, conducted by Mr. E. G. Beck, sent in six mixed-voice quartets in one competition. St. James's, Ratcliffe, Choral Society (Mrs. Atherton Knowles), and Lipton Choral Society (Mr. Cecil Free) were also the source of quartets and trios. Each of these choirs was a competitor in the Intermediate Choral Society class, the last-named being the winner. In the chief choral class Stepney Orpheus Choir (Rev. C. J. Beresford) stood at the head. There were in all fourteen classes for adult choirs, including, as usual, one for Mothers' Meetings. This brought in twelve entries. Choirs of Girls' Clubs and Girl Guides again arrived in great numbers. At the final concert the test-pieces were repeated by prize-winning choirs or the combined competitors. Miss Joan Elwes sang Bach, combined orchestras played the 'Prometheus' Overture, all joined in Dyson's 'Thanksgiving' and Bach's Cantata 'The Hundredth Psalm,' and the Duchess of Atholl distributed the prizes.

NEWCASTLE.—The Northern Tournament of Song (how much better a name than Eisteddfod!) ran a strenuous course from May 23 to 30. From an array of good things we mention especially the three solid days devoted to schools—infant, elementary, and secondary. Here was school singing that can hardly be bettered in any part of the country, and rarely equalled. We recall especially the sweet tone of the secondary schools and the infectious gusto of the best of the elementary. Sight-singing at Newcastle is public and compulsory, and the result of this courageous policy was seen in a very high standard, especially on the part of the choirs using Tonic Sol-fa. A notable feature was the time-beating by many of the choirs, even the infants keeping themselves as steady as little rocks by this simple but rarely-used expedient. The organization was highly efficient; it had to be with such crowds of children to manœuvre in so inconvenient a place as the Town Hall—a byword for bad acoustics, ugliness, and poor accommodation. This Festival, by the way, is (we believe) the only one in which a large number of local professional musicians play a prominent part as directors. The general idea is that the profession must be kept out of festival management, because it is full of envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness. Newcastle is a striking proof that professional musicians can not only dwell together in unity, but can pull together as well, with immense advantage on such an occasion as this. The principal choral prize was won by the Cecilia Glee Society, Middlesbrough (Mr. Gavin Kay), which was awarded full marks for its singing of Elgar's 'O wild, west wind.' Wearside Orchestra (Mr. Stanley E. Scott) again won its trophy without opposition. Newcastle's failure to send an orchestra against these players occasioned much comment.

DEVON.—This Festival (June 8-12) was divided as usual between Tavistock, Barnstaple, and Exeter, the last-named centre being allotted three days. On this year's showing one of these days might well have been given to Tavistock, where far more interest was shown. Solo classes were almost negligible in quantity and quality, and adult choirs were few—as was perhaps inevitable at so summery a date. But ample amends were made by the schools, elementary and secondary. Particularly good were the pick of the elementary schools at Tavistock, and the best of the senior secondary schools at Exeter. Sight-reading generally showed the tonic sol-faists well ahead of the rest—as usual. The public braved the heat-wave and turned up in good force at Tavistock and Barnstaple. At Exeter they succumbed, and stayed outside. No doubt an earlier date would suit both adult choirs and the general public, but apparently it would rule out some of the schools. We hope that if a change of date is contemplated the children's side will be carefully studied. So much excellent work is being done by the schools at all three centres that the future of the Festival may well be determined by it. Perhaps the solution lies in separating the adult and school sections.

The LEAMINGTON Competition Festival was held from June 18-20. Messrs. Plunket Greene, Harvey Grace, Julius Harrison, and Harold Samuels were the principal adjudicators, Mr. Grace and Mr. Harrison sharing the choral classes. A new section this year was a choral class open to choirs of village institutes in Warwickshire. Seventeen choirs entered, and the results were promising. Chief honours in the mixed-voice choirs went to the Coventry Choral Society, and for male-voice choirs to the Armstrong-Siddeley Choir, Coventry. The female-voice choir competition was won by Madame Gell's Ladies' Choir.

We have no space for an adequate reference to all the competitions that call for a place in this record, and we can do no more than mention even such important Festivals as that of HASTINGS, which occupied six days at the end of May; the STAFFORDSHIRE and BUXTON Festivals, of four days each; the second ISLE OF WIGHT Festival at Ryde, with three thousand competitors; the THANET Festival, at Ramsgate; NORTH AND EAST HERTS, at Hatfield; and many others. Among the smaller Festivals, one of the most successful was that held at BOURNVILLE, on June 13. It brought in thirteen male-voice choirs to sing Elgar's 'The Wanderer' and Bantock's 'Twilight tombs of ancient kings.'

We note that the promoters of the HALIFAX Festival are pluckily keeping their end up despite a lack of support surprising in so strong a choral centre. The syllabus for the next meeting (November 27-28) is before us, and shows a very interesting scheme and a capital standard in test-pieces. In the solo classes money-prizes give way to medals. We wish the executive had courageously adopted certificates. Sooner or later this kind of award will become general. After all, a medal is a poor trophy unless it be worn, and very few competitors care to bedeck themselves with such an ornament. On the other hand, a tastefully-designed certificate, neatly framed, disgraces no wall, whether it be of school, institute, or dwelling-house. The Halifax Secretary is Mr. J. E. Hoyle, 14a, Crossley Street. The syllabus pays a tribute to the memory of the late J. Weston Nicholl, a fine musician, and one of the founders of the Festival.

FESTIVALS IN SCOTLAND

GLASGOW Festival ran for over a fortnight, occupying sixty-seven separate three-hour sessions. Entries numbered 1,630 (representing about 14,000 competitors), viz.: 122 mixed, men's, women's, and church choirs; 109 school and junior choirs; fifty-four action song and singing game teams: forty-nine Scottish country dance teams; 587 solo vocalists; 386 elocutionists; 240 solo instrumentalists, &c.; three string orchestras; four full orchestras; thirty vocal and twenty-five instrumental chamber music entries; and eighteen musical composition entries. The principal winners were: Mixed choirs: Perth Madrigal Society; Mr. Thorpe Davie's Choir, Glasgow; and Kilmarnock Lyric Choir. Male choirs: Cleveland Harmonic, Middlesbrough; and the Glasgow Police. Women's choirs: Stanwix, Carlisle; and Mr. Thorpe Davie's Choir, Glasgow. Junior choirs: Dumbarton Equitable Co-operative, and Grangemouth High School Former Pupils. School choirs: Onslow Drive, Glasgow; Dumbarton Academy, North Kelvinside, Glasgow; Park School, Glasgow; and Maryhill Industrial Girls' School, Glasgow. Folk-dancing: Elgin Street School, Clydebank; and Strathclyde School, Glasgow. String and full orchestras: Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society. Solo singing: Festival diploma to Janet Battersby, Glasgow; Scots Song diploma to Alice Gray, Glasgow; honours certificate to Patrick Denny, Dumbarton. Violin playing: Festival diploma to Margaret Ludwig, Aberdeen. 'Cello playing: Maurice Westerby, Glasgow. Elocution: Festival diploma to Winning Rough, Glasgow; Scots diploma to Agnes P. Clingan, Grangemouth. The Festival diploma for pianoforte playing was withheld by Mr. Frederick Dawson, the standard reached not being sufficiently high, but some remarkable work was done in the pianoforte-playing 'memory' class. Outstanding features were the singing of Dumbarton Equitable Co-operative Junior Choir, which was praised practically without reserve by Mr. W. R. Anderson; the work of the Glasgow Amateur Orchestra, which greatly interested Prof. Bantock; the violin playing of Miss Margaret Ludwig; the 'cello playing of Master Maurice Westerby; and, not least, an action-song, 'The Hebridean Cockle-gatherers,' by the Glasgow Orpheus Juniors, which Prof. Bantock astonished us by finding lacking in spontaneity, but which we thought far and away the most lovely thing we have yet seen in this genre. Incidentally, the old heresy that choral singing is detrimental to vocal solo work was finally exploded by the fact that during the past two years three out of the four diploma winners in the solo classes have been Festival choralists. The fortnight closed fittingly on a Sunday afternoon with an inspiring Hymn Festival, conducted by Sir Walford Davies. The same evening, Mr. St. John Ervine, one of the elocution adjudicators, discussing the power of the arts from the pulpit of Trinity Church, Glasgow, said that the Festival was doing more to elevate public morality than all the reformatories and gaols in Christendom!

EDINBURGH Festival occupied seven full days, and had 809 entries, viz.: 38 Adult choirs; 79 school, junior, action-song, and singing game choirs; twenty country dance teams; 237 vocal soloists; 205 solo instrumentalists; 176 elocutionists; twenty-two vocal and eleven instrumental chamber music entries; one string orchestra; and twenty musical composition entries. The principal winners were—Mixed choirs: Perth Madrigal Society; Grangemouth Select Choir; and Auchterarder Institute. Male choirs: Glasgow Socialist Choristers. Female choirs: Mr. Thorpe Davie's Choir, Glasgow. Church choirs: Pollokshields Parish Church, Glasgow. Junior choirs: Glasgow Socialist Junior Choristers, and Grangemouth High School Former Pupils. Vocal solos: Festival diploma to Nan Macknight, Ardrossan; Scots diploma to David Duncan, Gorebridge; honours certificate to Agnes Dowdeswell. Elocution: Festival diploma to Elspeth Martin Scott, Edinburgh; Scots diploma to Betty Bartholomew, Edinburgh. In the school choir classes, North Berwick School had quite a number of wins to its credit. A good general standard was maintained in the instrumental classes, and Miss Waddell's orchestra of youthful players again did exceptionally well in the string orchestra class. Attendances were well maintained throughout the week, but the Saturday attendances were extraordinarily disappointing.

STIRLINGSHIRE.—This meeting, held at Stirling on May 18-23, was badly supported by the public, probably owing to the counter-attractions brought about by daylight-saving and fine weather. Solo entries were rather small, but of good quality, very promising form being shown by the junior vocalists as a body. The best work, however, was done by the school choirs, and first-rate it was. It set a standard from which adult musicians could learn much. The principal prizes in choral singing were carried on by Babcock & Wilcox Male-Voice Choir, Dumbarton (Mr. W. Grant), and Kilsyth Co-operative Choir (Mr. James H. Gibson).

The second WICK Festival (the most northerly in the Kingdom) had 270 entries, representing 1,400 competitors. Wide public interest was shown, and the standard of work was capital. Some remarkable results were achieved in the individual (under eighteen years) ear-training class, in which the winner, a girl, returned perfect answers in six progressively difficult, non-diatonic tests, after a close contest. Mr. H. S. Roberton, adjudicating, said that Wick could produce a team to do better ear-work, he thought, than probably any other district in the United Kingdom.

The fourth DUMFRIESSHIRE Festival, held at Dumfries, had a record entry of 292, representing 2,000 competitors. The best results were obtained in the school choir classes.

The three days' WEST LOTHIAN Festival at Linlithgow did well in its junior classes, but the senior classes continue to be disappointing, both in quantity and quality.

The Upper Ward of LANARKSHIRE Festival ran for three days at Lanark, and showed healthy progress.

At DUNDEE a difference has arisen between the Dundee Festival Executive and the local Education Authority, which threatens to nullify such progress as has already been made towards enlisting the interest of the general public and widening the scope of the Festival. As things stand, the Education Authority is insisting on continuing to hold preliminary competitions in the schools. From these the public is excluded, and the competitors are not given an opportunity for hearing each other's work. Only selected competitors are sent forward to the Festival proper. The result, it is said, is that the non-selected competitors, and their parents and friends, fail to take an interest in the Festival when it comes along. The executive officer of the Authority argues that if the preliminary contests for school children were not held, the Authority's active interest would become ineffective (we wonder why?), and this would react unfavourably on the teaching of singing in the schools. To the onlooker the attitude of the Education Authority seems quite incomprehensible.

The RENFREWSHIRE Festival and the MOTHERWELL and WISHAW Festival have lost, through death, the valued services of their hon. secretaries, Mr. J. M. Leighton and Mr. Thomas Rae respectively. Both were well-known public men in their districts, and had acted as secretaries of the Festivals since their inception.

FESTIVALS IN IRELAND

The COLERAINE MUSICAL FESTIVAL (May 19-21) showed no diminution of public favour, and the standard was good all round, especially that of the infants. Mr. Edgar L. Bainton was the adjudicator; he expressed his admiration for Irish folk-song.

CARRICKFERGUS FESTIVAL (May 20-23) was also a success, the opening day being given to elocution, of which Mr. James Stewart was the adjudicator. In vocal and instrumental music Sir Richard Terry and Dr. Lawrence Walker were the adjudicators. Sir Richard stated that the standard of singing showed a decided improvement.

CO. WEXFORD FEIS (May 31 and June 1) attracted a large hosting of the Gaelic element. In vocal music the standard was tolerably good, but the instrumental section showed a falling off from previous years. The dancing entries were as numerous as ever, and proved very enjoyable to votaries of Irish dancing.

TYRONE CHORAL FESTIVAL was held at Strabane, under the baton of Mr. Alfred Forbes, and the singing of old Scottish psalm-tunes was much appreciated.

Music in the Provinces

ALDEBURGH. — The Budapest Quartet played at Belstead House School on May 19, the concert being open to the public. The programme consisted of Beethoven's B flat Quartet No. 6, Smetana's 'Aus meinem Leben,' and Schumann's A major.

BANGOR.—The activities of the music department of University College for the present session came to an end with the ninety-third College weekly concert on June 4. The programme included Trio-Sonata in D minor (Dr. Arne), Brahms's Trio in C major, Haydn's 'Bird' String Quartet, and violin solos, 'Hebrew Melody,' arranged by Achron, and 'La Capricieuse,' Elgar. —— At the ninety-second concert, given on May 28, the Bangor Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. E. T. Davies, gave an interesting programme which included Haydn's 'London' Symphony.——During the past session there has been a good deal of music-making at the College, including a performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion and other choral works, three orchestral concerts by the local orchestra, twenty illustrated open lectures by Mr. E. T. Davies (the director), a miniature Folk-song Festival, a visit of the Hallé Orchestra, under Sir Hamilton Harty, and a visit from Sir Hugh Allen, who lectured on Bach. In addition there have been six chamber concerts under the auspices of the Musical Club.

BARROW.—The Madrigal Society, conducted by Mrs. Bourne, gave an invitation concert on May 26. The singing touched perfection in di Lasso's 'Hark, hark, the echo falling,' Wilbye's 'Why dost thou shoot?' Elgar's 'Death on the hills,' Cornelius's 'Death, thou art the tranquil night,' and other works of the same high standard.

BEDFORD.—The Musical Society closed its fifty-eighth season on May 14 with a well-chosen programme, which Mr. H. J. Colson conducted. The choir sang Brahms's 'Death of Trenar' and Bantock's 'A Pageant of Human Life.' The orchestra played Parry's 'English' Suite and a Bach Suite in B minor for flute and strings.

BIRMINGHAM.—At the annual orchestral concert given by the Midland Institute of Music on June 4, a performance of Laurence Powell's 'Charivari' was given under Prof. Granville Bantock's baton. Though some skill in orchestral scoring is shown, the work is too consciously imitative of several modern composers.——The small audiences which assembled to hear the Capetown Orchestra when it gave three concerts in the Town Hall were unworthy of the spirited efforts of this enthusiastic little body of players. The programme of the first concert included Haydn's E flat Symphony, No. 10, the 'Mastersingers' Overture, and 'On hearing the first cuckoo in Spring,' by Delius. The last-named was beautifully played, as were most works requiring delicacy of feeling and nuance. The programmes of the two succeeding concerts included solos on the xylophone and tic-tac.

BRIGHTON.—'The Golden Legend' was performed by the Brighton and Hove Harmonic Society on May 30—the Saturday of the Whitsun week-end—and drew a large audience to the Dome. Mr. Percy Taylor conducted.

BRISTOL.—The University Students' Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. Arthur S. Warrell, gave an enjoyable concert at Colston Hall on May 25. Two 'Carnegie' works of Leslie Woodgate, Holst's Choral Hymns from the 'Rig Veda,' choral excerpts from 'Hugh the Drover,' parodies by Herbert Hughes, Negro spirituals, and shanties sung with the help of the audience all went to make a well-varied and unusual programme.

CAMBRIDGE.—One of the musical events of the term was the playing of the Brussels Quartet at a C.U.M.S. concert in May.——The Society also held a Gibbons celebration at King's Chapel on Whit Sunday, and gave an excellent May week programme—R. T. Woodman's 'Falmouth,' two movements of the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Miss Kathleen Parlow, Dr. Wood's choral variations on 'Come, lasses and lads,' and 'Scheherazade.'

HARROGATE.—The first symphony concert of the season was given on May 27. Mr. Basil Cameron had a full orchestra under his direction in Haydn's 'Oxford' Symphony, Holst's 'Japanese Suite,' and, with Mr. Angus Morrison, Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte Concerto.

HARWICH.—Bach's 'Sing to the Lord' was the principal task of the Harwich and Dovercourt Choral Society at its last concert of the season. A programme largely drawn from test-pieces studied for competition included the 'Meistersinger' Fantasia and Purcell's 'Soul of the World.'

HASLEMERE.—James Shirley's masque, 'Cupid and Death,' was produced by the Haslemere Orchestral and Madrigal Society on May 30 in the New Hall. The incidental music of Matthew Locke and Christopher Gibbons was given under the direction of Mr. Anthony Bernard.

HURSTPIERPOINT.—A vocal and orchestral concert was given by the College on May 23. The music included a Symphony in B flat by Haydn and selections from 'Die Meistersinger'; Parry's 'England' and Vaughan Williams's 'Linden Lea' were sung by the whole school.

IPSWICH.—Ipswich School Choral Society, of seventy-five singers, gave Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' on May 20. The programme, directed by Mr. Stanley Wilson, also included Gibbons's 'The Silver Swan' and Walford Davies's 'Hymn before action.'

LEEDS.—At the last of the noontide recitals at Holy Trinity, Boar Lane, the Edward Maude String Orchestra played three movements, arranged by Julius Harrison from a Clavichord Suite by Domenico, three pieces from a Giles Farnaby Suite, and Sir Frederic Cowen's arrangement of Handel's Overture to 'Siroe.'

MANCHESTER. — The most important of the recent Tuesday mid-day programmes was that of May 26, when the Brodsky Quartet took part in the posthumous C major Quintet of Schubert—unless it were that of a fortnight earlier when Mr. Frank Mullings gave a Hugo Wolf recital. The new Tudor Trio—Miss Kathleen Forster (violin), Miss Molly Wright (violoncello), and Miss Annie Warburton (pianoforte)—made its début on May 25 in Beethoven's B flat Trio, Op. 97.

OXFORD.—In anticipation of the Christ Church Quatercentenary of June an eights-week concert on May 23 had a programme drawn entirely from composers who had been connected with the House or Cathedral. The list included Farnaby, Crotch, Basil Harwood, Peter Warlock, and King Henry VIII. Dr. Ley directed the concert.——Mr. Keith Douglas conducted the 'New World' Symphony and his own symphonic poem, 'Oxford,' at the Town Hall, on May 24.——A new cantata, 'Salve Caput Cruentatum,' by Mr. Fritz Benniche Hart, director of the Melba Conservatorium at Melbourne, was performed at Queen's Chapel, on June 14 under Mr. Maurice Besly.

SEATON.—The East Devon Orchestra, formed last autumn under the direction of Mr. Arthur Billingsley, is making rapid progress, and on June 5 gave a very satisfactory performance of Beethoven's fifth Symphony at the Town Hall, Seaton.

Music in Scotland

DUNFERMLINE.—With a view to the further encouragement of local musical societies, and the fostering of amateur interest in music generally, the Carnegie Dunfermline Trustees, after consulting Sir Walford Davies, have established a Music Institute to serve as headquarters not only for local musical societies, but also for all people in the city with musical interests.

EDINBURGH.—At the fifth meeting of the Edinburgh Bach Society for the season, interesting works by Byrd, Monteverde, Schutz, and Bach were presented. Mr. Douglas Dickson was re-appointed conductor.——Miss Gladys Clark, the Edinburgh violinist, with Mr. Petrie Dunn at the pianoforte, gave the first of a series of three 'five o'clock' chamber concerts, the programme comprising Sonatas by Beethoven and Brahms, and the Vivaldi Concerto in G minor for violin.——A choir of three hundred boys from George Heriot's School gave a concert in Usher Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. B. Moonie. The choir, which sang folk- and other songs, would benefit greatly from a course of competitive festival work.——Sir Walford Davies addressed the Scottish branch of the Church-Music Society, and, referring to the proposed new 'Church Hymnary,' said that in choosing tunes to be handed down to our children high principle must be the criterion. We wanted to get back to the sturdy health of the common chord. A general purging of music was necessary, and Vaughan Williams and Holst were greatly helping to achieve this.——Mr. Herbert Wiseman, director of music to the Edinburgh Education Authority, addressed the Glasgow Business Club and the Edinburgh Rotary Club on the practical value of music in education and in industry.——The members of the Glasgow Society of Organists, and their friends, to the number of about a hundred, visited Edinburgh as guests of the Edinburgh Society of Organists, and inspected many of the principal church and cathedral organs there.

GLASGOW.—The conductors engaged by the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union for the Scottish Orchestra next season are Hermann Abendroth, Felix Weingartner, Emil Mlynarski, and Vaclav Talich. The only new-comer is Prof. Abendroth, from Cologne. Weingartner and Vaclav Talich both appeared with the Scottish Orchestra for the first time last season. Mlynarski came to Glasgow for several seasons before the war, and renewed his acquaintance with the city two years ago. Provisional arrangements were made with Herr Bruno Walter, but these ultimately fell through.——At the annual prize-giving of the Glasgow Athenæum School of Music, which is stated to have more students than any other music school in the Kingdom, Sir Daniel Stevenson, who presented the prizes, foreshadowed the early expansion of the Athenæum School of Music into a Scottish National Academy of Music, at Glasgow. A proposal, initiated by Sir Daniel, to use the present Athenæum school as the nucleus of a national school, substantially endowed, and to conjoin the Principalship of the School with a Chair of Music at Glasgow University is rapidly taking shape.——At a municipal orchestral concert in Lynn Park, the Horace Fellowes Orchestra played a movement of a new work by W. B. Moonie, a young Edinburgh composer, entitled the 'Deeside' Symphony. It is based on old Aberdeenshire melodies, and the movement performed makes large use of the Scots tune 'Dark Lochnagar.' The composer conducted.——The mixed- and male-voice choirs of the Glasgow Police Musical Association (Mr. Thorpe Davie) gave a widely varied programme of part-songs at their final concert, the male choir, as was to be expected, being much the better of the two.

PAISLEY.—The Glen concert, an old annual institution designed to perpetuate the memory of Robert Tannahill, Paisley's famous poet and song-writer, was held at the Glen, Gleniffer Braes, Paisley. Dr. Williams conducted a choir of six hundred voices in songs by Tannahill, Burns, Lady Nairne, and other Scots lyrists. SEBASTIAN.

Music in Wales

The advent of summer has the effect of slowing down some of the ordinary outward manifestations of musical activity, but though these are actually somewhat less there is still a good deal of inconspicuous movement going forward.

During the early days of June, when farming does not claim the whole of the daylight hours of the agriculturist, the Cymanfa Ganu (the hymn-singing festival) is in full swing, more especially in the country districts, where neighbouring towns and villages unite for combined performance of specially prepared hymns and anthems, alternating the locale year by year, so that each place has its turn.

The preparation for such a Festival as that due at Harlech Castle at the end of June involves many months of patient practice over a district which includes a large part of Merioneth and South Carnarvonshire. For such an occasion the enthusiastic choristers travel miles over mountain and valley week by week to learn works which they, and often their conductors, have never had an opportunity for hearing beforehand.

Another event for which much work has been going forward is the Aberystwyth Musical Festival, which, like the Harlech Festival, will be a thing of the past by the time these lines appear. Immense effort is also being put forth over a wide area preparing for the great National Eisteddfod at Pwllheli, which takes place during the first week in August.

ABERYSTWYTH.—On May 29 the Cardiganshire Festival took place in University Hall. Twenty-one children's choirs, drawn from urban and rural districts in Central Cardiganshire, contributed an interesting programme during the morning session, accompanied by a children's orchestra, the afternoon and evening sessions being devoted to the performances of older choralists. The evening session consisted mainly of Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation.' The soloists were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Mr. T. J. Pickering, and Mr. David Evans. The Welsh Symphony Orchestra accompanied, and contributed some instrumental items. The Festival conductors were Mr. Adrian C. Boult and Mr. J. T. Rees.

CARDIFF.—The Cape Town Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Leslie Heward, has been giving performances at Cardiff.

LLANDAFF.—On June 8, a Tercentenary commemoration of Orlando Gibbons took place at the Cathedral, the choir being supplemented by the Cardiff Musical Society, conducted by Mr. T. E. Aylward. The service was Gibbons in F, the anthems being 'Almighty and everlasting God' and 'Hosanna to the Son of David.'

NEWTOWN.—The Montgomeryshire County Festival took place on May 28, and over a thousand choralists and instrumentalists took part. The chief works selected were Handel's 'Samson,' Mendelssohn's unaccompanied 'Judge me, O God,' Max Bruch's 'On Jordan's Banks,' and a Welsh cantata, 'Duw Sydd Noddfa' ('God is our Refuge'), by J. T. Rees, who conducted his own work. The conductor-in-chief was Mr. Adrian Boult. A contingent of the Welsh Symphony Orchestra, assisted by local instrumentalists, accompanied the choral works, and played several orchestral items. Two notable features of the afternoon meeting were the performance of Handel's Oboe Sonata, by Mr. D. F. Griffiths, of the Albert Hall Orchestra, and a Beethoven Trio by Sir Walford Davies (pianoforte), Miss Evelyn Cooke (violin), and Mr. Arthur Williams ('cello).

RHYMNEY.—The Rhymney Mixed Choir, conducted by Mr. John Price, a veteran of many honours and conductor of the Llandaff Diocesan Church Choral Association, had the honour of giving a command performance before the King and Queen at Windsor.

TONREFAIL.—On June 8 the St. George's War Memorial Church Choir gave a performance of an oratorio 'David and Jonathan' to a crowded congregation. Mr. G. E. Williams conducted, and Mr. F. Turp led the orchestra. Mr. F. Young accompanied at the organ, and Miss Young at the pianoforte.

Music in Ireland

The Dublin Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Turner Huggard, had an auspicious opening on May 16, and presented a good programme, including Vaughan Williams's Mass in G minor.

At a meeting of the Bibliographical Society of Ireland, at the Royal Irish Academy, on May 27, a paper was read by Chevalier Grattan Flood on 'The oldest printed Irish song set to music'—being an Irish song by O'Carolan, printed in Abell's collection of 1701.

On May 21 an admirable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' under Dr. Hewson, was given by Dublin University Choral Society, Mr. John L. Woods being particularly impressive.

M. Staf Gebruers, a pupil of M. Jef Denyn, has been appointed organist and carillonneur of Cobh (Queenstown) Cathedral. During June, July, and August he intends giving bell recitals on Wednesdays and Sundays.

On May 29, the Belfast Radio Station gave an all-Irish programme, including selections on the Irish Uillean pipes by Mr. R. O'Mealy, a fine exponent of the ancient instrument immortalised by Shakespeare.

Much satisfaction was felt by his many friends on the news of Hamilton Harty's knighthood, and, in recognition thereof, and coupled with his honorary degree of Mus. D. of Dublin University, it is intended to give him a rousing reception, honoured by the presence of H.E. The Governor-General of the Irish Free State, at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, on June 26. Congratulations to Sir Hamilton.

'Are musicians clubable?' asks a Daily Paper. In our opinion many of them are, but we so often leave our club at home.—Punch.

Musical Notes from Abroad

BUSONI'S 'DOCTOR FAUST' AT DRESDEN STAATSOPER

When, about a year ago, we had to lament the tragic end of the strangest individuality among the musicians of our time, our mourning became still deeper by the thought that his last work, his 'Doctor Faust,' was not completed. What was to be a synthesis of his life-work had been delayed by his illness. Busoni had aspired to conjure up the tragedy of his life by the never-ceasing activity of his spirit. But at last the law of life proved more powerful than the spirit. He had stopped in the middle of the last scene hoping and, at the same time, fearing to finish his 'Faust.' This very fact illustrates the conflict and the uneasiness in which Busoni lived. The man who, as he himself pointed out, strove for nothing so much as for the shape and order of his musical ideas, had to submit to a fate which prevented him from giving his work its last form.

Busoni had chosen the subject of Faust because doubt was the source of his creative work. The pianist who had reached the heights of virtuosity was, in the midst of his glorious career, dissatisfied with all that he had done. His spirit, never at rest, drove him farther and farther in the field of creative art. He aimed at conquering new territories by extending the material of sound. Yet in the greater part of his creations we may find the reflection of his virtuoso career. The more, however, he advanced in life and in art, the more the independence of his mind became evident, even in his musical work, till at last, when the war began, Busoni's spiritual existence was completely filled by the thought of how he might carry out his artistic ideal—not as performing pianist, but as a composer no less personal than the performer. Whereas hitherto he had felt himself to be the true heir of Franz Liszt, in the last decade of his life he could boast of having shed all the ambitions of virtuososhiip; and it was just at this period that he strove to fulfil his ideal of juvenescent classicism, which was the last and highest concept of his artistic being—for he had parted with all the catchwords of modernity, devoting himself exclusively to the achievement of what his immaterial intelligence commanded. His aim was essentially different from that pursued by others.

Busoni felt that for him the popularity of, e.g., a Richard Strauss was impossible. He always drew back from the special kind of feeling that so often degenerates into sentimentality. Perhaps he would have liked to be as Italian as Verdi; there are some passages in his works which suggest this. But at the moment when he makes use of the canzone or the aria, he shrinks within himself and seems to deride it. Always there is in him the conflict of the northern and southern races, the former of which was revealed as the more powerful, though to the latter is due the perfection of form and style that distinguishes his best output.

All this serves to show why Ferruccio Busoni (who, by the way, was more than an amateur in other fields of art and science) found natural inspiration in the subject of 'Faust,' for in it he discerned the real substance of his being. Opera, in the popular sense, was foreign to him, but 'Faust' was an operatic subject he could approach seriously. He was fully conscious of the limitations of his genius. Having thoroughly examined Goethe's 'Faust,' he despaired of keeping on a level with it as a musician, and examined all the versions of the marionette play of 'Doctor Faust.' In 1914 he put down the first sketch of the libretto of his own 'Doctor Faust.' The Gretchen episode does not appear in it at all, and in a Busoni opera love scenes could not play an important part. Indeed this was to be, not an opera, but a poem for music. It avoids all that is conventional. We do not find in it the common division into acts. It consists of different sections bearing the names of prologue, prelude, and interlude. In the middle is a principal play, in which the scene is transferred to Parma, the true atmosphere for opera. But the place of Faust's principal activity is Wittenberg, where he receives, from three Krakovian students, the magic book revealing the mysteries of occult power; there he signs his contract with Mephisto, and there he dies, not without the full assurance that the eternal will embodied in himself is to live, as is demonstrated by the appearance of a youth arising from the soil.

In this work Busoni's music attains expressive heights never touched by him before. By clearly defining for himself the limits within which his imaginative force would move, he was free to take advantage of all the resources of his genius. It is a very wide horizon from which he considers music. There are two great stations at which he stops—Bach and Berlioz. It is the polyphonic structure of the former and the controlled passion of the latter that govern Busoni's inventiveness, but without disadvantage to his musical independence. Busoni makes free use of all the means available to him by the development of modern music. His writing, particularly in the symphony serving as introduction to the work, may at times seem atonal, but harmonic relations between the single chords are still to be discerned. The fantastic element, in which Busoni finds encouragement in Berlioz's 'Mephisto,' has a colour of its own. In the Act laid at Parma, Busoni professes to be an Italian, but his gaiety is temperated by an austere nobility. When, at Wittenberg, a quarrel arises between Catholics and Protestants, the opposition of 'Te Deum' and 'Ein' feste Burg' in brilliant polyphonic texture makes an extremely effective scene. 'Doctor Faust' has been musically completed by Busoni's pupil, Philipp Jarnach, who brought to the work a rare sense of style. Jarnach is certainly the only musician capable of achieving Busoni's imaginative flight, and of using the motives furnished by Busoni himself in the preceding sections. Probably Busoni would have found new motives for the final scene. So much may be deduced from his long pause in the act of composition. Under the circumstances, however, we may be glad that the work has been carried to completion in so reverent a spirit.

The orchestral colour of the score, sometimes ascetic, sometimes fascinating, always bears the personal stamp of Busoni. It is clear, too, that the voices, which represent the sensual part of the music, are a less ravishing instrument in Busoni's hands. But the whole of the work is so true and so perfect an expression of the composer's thought that it could but deeply impress the hearers, who were made to feel that they were present at one of those musical events which for ever remain unforgettable, and not a mere operatic performance.

This effect was attained in spite of some shortcomings to be noted in the performance itself, which was perfect so far as the orchestra was concerned. Fritz Busch conducted with energy and refinement. The Dresden Orchestra, with its high traditions and its wonderful wind players, did its best to carry out the intentions of the composer. But the stage management was not quite in the style that Busoni would have desired. Robert Burg as Faust emphasised his part more than was intended, but his fine voice contributed much to the great impression produced by Doctor Faust. The Mephisto was less happily represented by Theo Strack. Meta Seinemeyer sang extremely well as the Duchess of Parma.

It is to be hoped that 'Doctor Faust,' though probably very difficult for small theatres, will find its way on to the principal operatic stages of the world.

STRAVINSKY AT THE BERLIN STAATSOPER

Shortly before the end of the musical season a very interesting evening took place at the Berlin Staatsoper. It may be considered a symptom of Stravinsky's growing popularity that it was wholly devoted to this composer's works. In France Stravinsky belongs to the stage, and is dependent for performance on the Russian ballet. In Germany he still belongs essentially to music, because here there is no dependance on an old ballet culture. And since his influence has made itself felt only since the war he is still absorbing the attention of the musical world and appears much more revolutionary than he really is. The consequence of this musical attention to Stravinsky is that his works are performed with much more accuracy and intensity than in those places where some of them have become simple ballet affairs.

At all events, the Berlin Staatsoper deserves much praise for having made a triptych of three Stravinsky works of different character—'L'Histoire du Soldat,' 'Pulcinella,' and 'Renard.' Each was given in its own style. The refined primitiveness of 'L'Histoire du Soldat' received a more artificial presentation than when, some years ago, it was performed at Berlin. A primitive stage on a scaffolding was shown to the audience (this device recalled a piece by Tristan Tsara, produced last year, at Paris; and Pirandello has introduced similar things); then the musicians were called, and gathered under the direction of Erich Kleiber. But the artificial character of the performance was emphasised by the lecturer who accompanies all the events on the stage. As the alter ego of the soldier, instead of being purely a story-teller, he grew so passionate that the ambition of the actor spoiled the effect. Ernst Legal's Satanic impersonation was extremely well done. Legal, formerly an actor, is now General-Intendant at Darmstadt. But the best part was the music itself, very effectively conducted by Erich Kleiber, if perhaps with too much virtuosity.

'Pulcinella,' which had been heard some months before as a concert suite, derived new splendour from the stage management and the ballet, though of course the impression was not equal to that produced by the Diaghilev Company. It was again the sheer merit of the music that sustained the interest. 'Renard' left its hearers puzzled. After 'Pulcinella' they had expected something more substantial, but the preceding numbers had proved so satisfying that the audience accepted this burlesque ballet without serious objection.

ADOLF WEISSMANN.

HOLLAND

It is doubtful if even the most enthusiastic admirer of things Dutch would call Julius Röntgen a great composer, but that he is a master of his technique, that he possesses and expresses graceful ideas, and that he has done much to encourage Dutch music and to increase the knowledge and appreciation of Dutch folk-song is undeniable. For these reasons his seventieth birthday has been celebrated with that dignity and enthusiasm which are characteristic of all such events here, and his colleagues, including his son Julius, joined in a very pleasant concert of his works. Another 'celebration' was connected with the unveiling of a monument erected over the grave of J. B. C. de Pauw, one of Holland's most famous organists and most effective teachers. The unveiling was attended by Sam Dresden, Director of the Amsterdam Conservatoire, where de Pauw was for many years a teacher. Other professors of that institution and a large number of his pupils were also present, one of the latter, William Andriessen, a well-known composer, pronouncing a panegyric. A few days later a similiar monument was dedicated to the memory of J. Mossel, the well-known 'cellist, and brother of Max Mossel. The occasion was marked by tributes from members of the theatrical profession, as well as from musicians in Holland, England, and Germany.

At the present moment competitions are supplying a large amount of the musical life of the country, though they are not yet organized on the scale, nor are they even of the artistic standard, of those of England. Another kind of competition is that for the subsidies which government and municipal authorities grant to musical societies of various kinds; but these competitions are more directly social and political rather than musical in their outlook. The Italian opera, organized and, until his death a few months ago, carried on, by the late Cavaliere M. de Hondt, has been successful in getting a subsidy of ten thousand guilders for general purposes and another five thousand for popular performances at The Hague. The widow of M. de Hondt is now acting as general and artistic manager. Co-Opera-tie, a company devoting its efforts to a somewhat wider programme, also announces a long season, of which thirty-five performances will take place at The Hague. This company—in contrast to the Italian Opera, which has been in existence for twenty-eight years—is of only recent formation. It is also understood that the Moscow Opera is to pay a professional visit to Holland on its way to America. Toscanini has promised Mengelberg that he will be at Amsterdam to conduct at least one concert next season. We shall see! Much amusement as well as interest has been aroused by the attempt of a barber at The Hague to bring back the days when the members of his profession provided opportunities for their clients to enjoy music while awaiting their cue of 'next, please.' Unfortunately his methods brought him into conflict with the police, for he had installed a wireless set without obtaining the necessary license, and, moreover, had allowed it to be in operation after the sacred hour of 8 p.m. The barber was fined a guilder, or a day in prison. But he is appealing against this sentence; so the tonsorial ordeal may yet become the lightsome hour that once it was.

Organization is very much in the air, and attempts are being made to unite, or at least to federate, various professional bodies, though so far such attempts have miscarried. The example of the Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst, with its ramifications all over the country in the way of choral societies, conservatoires, and historical research bodies, is admirable, and although much criticism is directed against this association for its production of operas on the concert-platform, its activities are unquestionably great and beneficial. Next month the annual meeting is to be held at Scheveningen, when a new work, 'Jupiter Amans,' by Dr. Johan Wagenaar, the head of the conservatoire at The Hague, and conductor of The Hague section of the Maatschappij, will be produced.

During the recent visit of foreign (chiefly English) journalists to this country in connection with the jubilee of the Zeeland Steamship Company, music played a very acceptable part, Mr. George Robert giving a recital of popular music on the Haarlem organ, and the South Beveland a cappella choir from Goes, a small village in Zeeland, giving at one of the resting-places on a motor tour a concert that was a model in every respect. One hears few choirs of such excellence as this, which is composed of some twenty-five men and women employed in various trades, and has a conductor who is also a workman, but who in his spare time achieves what few professional conductors can attain to. His name is S. J. Tamminga, and if he does his daily task as well as he conducts his choir he is an extraordinary worker.

The Scheveningen season opened on June 19, The Hague Residentie Orchestra again providing the principal concerts under the direction of Georg Schneevoigt and Ignaz Neumark. The fine array of soloists are to be increased in numbers as the season proceeds. Wednesdays and Sundays are announced as soloist concerts—that is, with a famous player as the centre of attraction—and there are to be Friday symphony concerts.

HERBERT ANTCLIFFE.

LENINGRAD

The end of the musical season was marked by the symphony concerts of the Philharmonia, conducted by Heintz Unger, of Berlin. Shortly before, some of the latest operatic novelties were produced on the stages of both our Academic Opera Theatres (the late Marinsky and Michel).

Generally speaking, the season was characterised by the greater number of conductors and interpreters who came to Leningrad from abroad. The State Philharmonia, which grew a few years ago out of the late Court Symphony Orchestra, was the principal centre of activity. Its concerts are given in the late Salle de la Noblesse, to which has been added a smaller hall for concerts. In this hall a quartet consisting of Lukashevich (first violin), Pechnikov (second violin), Ryvkin (viola), and Mogylevsky ('cello), gave a series of recitals devoted to the works of Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, and S. Tanéïèv, and another devoted to new works which included the first performances here of compositions by Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Casella, Honegger, and others.

During the early part of the season the symphony concerts of the Philharmonia were conducted by a young and very capable new-comer, Valery Berdaiev, who also conducted a few performances. He has his orchestra well in hand, and achieves fine, highly-finished effects. His one fault is a tendency to hasten things. This is particularly obvious in Berlioz's 'Damnation de Faust,' which had not been played here for many years. The novelties he introduced were the third Symphony (a 'Symphonic Mystery' inspired by the Book of Revelation) of Andrei Pashchenko, a gifted young composer (born 1883), and a 'Lithuanian Rhapsody' by Karlovich. Apart from these he drew chiefly on Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Wagner.

Another young conductor, A. Gauck, introduced Richard Strauss's beautiful incidental music to the 'Bourgeois Gentilhomme.'

Guest-conductors did not provide as many unhackneyed works as we could have wished for. Otto Klemperer conducted two concerts. His success was great, but it is only in the older classics that he is really good. He conducted Stravinsky's 'Pulcinella' Suite twice. Hermann Abendroth proved the most interesting among the visitors. His programme included Reger's 'Böcklin' Suite. Heintz Unger gave us Mahler's fifth Symphony and 'Kinder Toten Lieder,' and Prokofiev's third Pianoforte Concerto (soloist, Madame N. Poznakovskaya).

Among soloists should also be mentioned Henri Marteau and Josef Szigetti; Vladimir Gorovitz, a young pianist who gave concerts by the dozen; Arthur Schnabel, whose earnestness was as highly appreciated as was Egon Petri's splendid virtuosity; and Michel Zadora, who interprets Chopin in a remarkable style of his own, aiming at intimacy and quiet.

At the late Marinsky Theatre only one actual novelty was given, viz., Schreker's 'Der Ferne Klang.' The greatest success was for Strauss's 'Salome'—partly owing to the excellence of Pavlovskaya as Salome, and of Ershov as Herod. Otto Klemperer's conducting of 'Carmen' was interesting, and after a fashion constituted a testimonium paupertatis for Russian conductors. The projected performance of Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots' with a new libretto whose subject is the insurrection of the 'Decembrists' (in 1825) did not take place. At the late Theatre Michel, Puccini's 'Tosca' was given with its new Russian libretto under the title 'The Fight for Communism'; and performances of the first Russian revolutionist opera, 'For Red Petrograd' (the music by Gladkovsky and Prussak), followed. An operetta by Lehar, 'The Dance of the Dragonflies,' was produced on the same stage.

At the Conservatorium the tenth anniversary of Anna Essipova's death was commemorated by a special meeting and two concerts. But the thirty-fifth anniversary of Anton Rubinstein, the admirable artist who founded this Conservatorium, passed altogether unnoticed.

N. FINDENSEN.

NEW YORK

The various conductors and managers who yearly try to rake Europe with a fine tooth comb for artists to present to American audiences do not seem to have had great success this summer. Only two imported singers made much impression in the past season, and these were both operatic artists who appeared at the Metropolitan Opera House—Nanny Larsen Todsen (soprano) and Karin Branzell (contralto). The speciality of both was German opera, though both also sang in Italian and French. Larsen Todsen appeared as the three Brünnhildes—her 'Walküre' impersonation being by far the best, and that in 'Götterdämmerung' the least successful. Her Isolde was a fair achievement, but it was not great, and her Kundry was colourless. Branzell was more successful as an all-round singer, giving us a very successful Brangaene and Fricka. On one occasion, when Todsen fell ill and failed to sing in 'Walküre,' the substitute was so hoarse that she failed to get through the second Act, and omitted her scene with Wotan. Branzell discarded her Fricka's garb, and donning Brünnhilde's robes and armour, sang the third Act, thus saving the opera from collapse. Both Todsen and Branzell made satisfactory appearances in Italian opera, singing Aïda and Amneris together; and both sang in French—Todsen as Rachel, in 'La Juive,' and Branzell as Dalila, in 'Samson.'

On the concert-platform only one new pianist (Harold Samuel being a specialist) made a sensation, viz., Alexander Brailowsky, who proved to be a brilliant player with a fine technique, but lacking in poetic temperament. Really more satisfactory was Wanda Landowska on that excellent tinkling instrument, the harpsichord. There were no new violinists; two, however—Albert Spalding and Paul Kochanski—both already in the front rank, show growth every year in their art.

But if it was not a great season for new artists, it was certainly a great season for conductors. At least twenty appeared at the head of the various orchestras, and more are coming next year. The Philharmonic, always prolific in leaders, presented six—Willem Mengelberg, Willem van Hoogstraten, Henry Hadley, Ernest Schelling, Wilhelm Furtwängler, and Igor Stravinsky. The first two divided the regular season between them, Hoogstraten leading from October to mid-winter, and Mengelberg the latter part of the year. Mr. Hadley has charge of American compositions which are presented in mid-winter. Mr. Schelling has the children's concerts in his care. Furtwängler and Stravinsky came as guest-conductors, and if Stravinsky was intended to be a sensation, he proved to be a very poor conductor, and we are quite contented to dispense with his services in this line if he leaves 'Petrouchka,' 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' 'Rossignol,' and 'Renard,' for others to interpret. Furtwängler gave us a surprise, for the reputation that preceded him fell far short of his merits, and every music-lover is glad that he will return next season as Mengelberg's alternative, for Hoogstraten is leaving the Philharmonic after the Stadium summer concerts. The guest-conductor that the Philharmonic will import next season is Arturo Toscanini. It is probably undisputed that Toscanini is the greatest living opera conductor, but it remains to be seen if he will find equal favour as a concert-conductor in America. When he was connected with the Metropolitan Opera House he led a performance of the ninth Symphony which did not receive universal commendation, and when several years later he came here on a concert tour, the orchestra he brought with him was of such inferior quality that it would not be fair to judge his capabilities on the concert-platform until we have heard what he can do with such a first-class organization as the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

The New York Symphony Orchestra is not exercised from year to year as to who shall be its leader. Walter Damrosch is an institution, and the only change of late is that forty years of hard work have so told on him physically that for several seasons he has had a guest-conductor who could relieve him of some of his duties and give him a little vacation in mid-winter. When he first started this innovation he would try a guest-conductor for two or three weeks, and the next season give him control for a longer period. The first of these guests was Albert Coates, who, after his preliminary trial, came for two longer visits. Then came Bruno Walter, under the same conditions, and next winter Eugène Goossens will come from Rochester (where he succeeds Albert Coates as director of the Eastman School) for two weeks in mid-winter, to be followed by the importation of Otto Klemperer, who will conduct for two months, as Damrosch feels the necessity for a longer vacation than usual. Klemperer was born about the same time that Damrosch assumed control of the New York Symphony Orchestra—a little over forty years ago—and is well known in Europe. He has not had the usual two or three weeks' trial—so all we can say is that we hope he will make good.

The State Symphony Orchestra, the third of our local orchestras, is wiping the slate clean of conductors, and beginning all over again. This band was inaugurated by the friends of Josef Stransky, when he retired from the Philharmonic, so that he should still have a conductor's post. Then Stransky himself almost disrupted the organization by abruptly leaving it in the midst of last winter's season, and devoting himself exclusively to his other artistic occupation, his picture gallery! Ignaz Waghalter, who succeeded him, did not prove a drawing card, and almost every one predicted the demise of the State Symphony. But its career is to continue, and two conductors are announced for next season, viz., Ernst Dohnányi and Alfredo Casella. What they will accomplish, artistically and financially, is one of the problems of the future.

There are no changes in the conductorship of our visiting orchestras. Kussewitzky was a novelty last season when he replaced Monteux at the head of the Boston Symphony, and he was cordially received at his first appearance at New York. Boston may continue to like him, but New York is already rather tired of him. He is too erratic, conducting one number in a programme so well that we become almost enthusiastic, and then spoiling it all by either introducing something too inane to listen to, or giving an interpretation so careless or stupid as to be exasperating.

As for the Philadelphia Orchestra, while there may be a few individual changes in its personnel (which is admitted to be the finest assembly of musicians gathered together as orchestral players anywhere in the world), a guest-conductor or an alternate is unthinkable. Without Leopold Stokowski the orchestra as we know it would cease to exist. It is the result of his work alone. To quote Mr. Gilman,

> '. . . the supremacy of the Philadelphia Orchestra is due to the fact that it is subject without remission to the control of a single guiding spirit. The gods have granted us this singular and delectable combination of an exceptional artist equipped with an instrument which yields him whatever he asks of it.'

If it is ever possible to criticise the Philadelphia it can never be from any other aspect than interpretation or tempi. We cannot all think alike on these two points.

Stokowski, as well as Bodanzky, likes to delve into the archives, and last winter, while the latter was giving us Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas,' at a 'Friends of Music' concert, the former gave us a 'Trumpet Prelude' by the same old English composer, which the conductor found last summer in the library of the British Museum. It is short and melodious, but nothing is known of its history, not even whether it is an independent composition or an excerpt from a larger work. We love these old things when they are worth resurrecting, and many (but not all) of them are. Conductors have come to rely on Bach more and more every year. Notable performances were given this season of the 'St. John' Passion by the Friends of Music Society, under Bodanzky, and of the 'St. Matthew' Passion by the Philharmonic, under Mengelberg.

It is a mistake to think that our orchestras open and close the musical season. Mrs. Coolidge, at her Festival in the Berkshires, has opened the season in September for several years, and for even a longer time it has been closed by the Bach Festival at Bethlehem, Pa. Meanwhile there are numerous smaller festivals, both in the spring and fall, in many places all over the country, that grow in importance, as well as in real artistic merit, every year, and once in two years we have the Cincinnati May Festival, founded by Theodore Thomas in the 'seventies, and which retains the prestige he gave it. The choir does superb work, and the soloists are the best obtainable. This is one of Cincinnati's biennials. The choral effects in the 'St. John' Passion were remarkable. Madame Louise Homer and George Meader were among the soloists. In Liszt's setting of Psalm 13, John McCormack was at his best, and in Pierné's 'St. Francis of Assisi,' Edward Johnson, with his rare combination of voice, art, and intelligence, was singled out for special applause. Three such tenors on consecutive evenings gave unrivalled enjoyment to festival audiences.

Florence Austral, the Australian dramatic soprano, created a sensation in the Brahms 'Requiem.' It is seldom that so capable an artist makes her American début outside of New York. The Festival was under the direction of Frank Van Der Stucken, grown to be a veteran at the conductor's desk.

The annual Bach Festival at Bethlehem, Pa., takes place at the end of May. It lasts only two days, and the first part is devoted to a novelty or to a comparatively unfamiliar work. This year the 'Christmas' Oratorio was chosen for the first day. The choir, composed entirely of singers who live in Bethlehem and neighbouring towns, although singing with sincerity, did not appear at its best in the Oratorio, and the soloists, also of native extraction, did not command particular attention. It might be truly said that the first day of the Festival is rather experimental; the second, always devoted to a performance of the great B minor Mass, is a gratifying and satisfying event. When the Festivals were started, Dr. J. Fred Wolle, the conductor, insisted on giving the B minor Mass. He was warned against it on account of the difficulties the music would present to the comparatively untrained choir, but he prevailed, and the yearly performances (with continual rehearsals), have resulted in superb interpretations. Nicholas Douty, a tenor from Philadelphia, has sung in the nineteen Festival performances of the Mass.

PARIS

Among the outstanding performances of the past month Alexander Borovsky's five pianoforte recitals devoted to music of the 18th and 20th centuries are particularly noteworthy. In a preface appended to the programme Borovsky marks the decline of romanticism in contemporary music, and outlines its tendency to revive 18th-century æsthetics. Many of Borovsky's assertions correspond doubtless to a feeling that daily becomes stronger, both among musicians and public. More than his theories, however, Borovsky's playing wins unalloyed admiration. He is powerful as few pianists are nowadays, and the would-be coldness in the performance proceeds from his rigorous style, which contains feeling, but does not neglect the exigencies of intelligence and the dictates of clarity. Furthermore, Borovsky is to be thanked for the very large part allowed in his programmes to advanced music. This needs courage—as well as contempt for easy success.

The Residentie-Orkest of The Hague paid us a short visit. This excellent group needs no praise to uphold its fame abroad. Its string department made a deep impression both by its discipline and its sonorous output. Van Anrooy, its chief, led the Orchestra with discreet authority, exempt from any search for personal effects. Among the items performed mention must be made of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, a work that is rarely performed in this city. The floating impression engendered by its facile inspiration and loose development was partly atoned for by its naive poetry, a precious quality of which we are actually deprived beyond measure.

The Petite Scène, a group of well-trained amateurs, presented Monteverde's last lyrical work, 'Ulysses' Return Home.' This performance is due to the efforts of Xavier de Courville for the literary and Vincent d'Indy for the musical arrangement.

The International Exhibition of Modern Decorative Arts is gratifying us with musical festivities, some of which are worth attention. Walther Straram conducted, at the Exhibition Theatre, three concerts devoted to modern international music. The second, on June 8, contained Lord Berners's 'Three Pieces' for orchestra. The public was interested in them, but could not help establishing a rather close analogy with Stravinsky's 'Petrouchka.' So far as these pieces are concerned, Lord Berners seems fully to have taken hold of Stravinsky's technique. This is a remarkable asset, and no doubt the talented English composer will put it to profitable use in the way of allowing him to bring forward his own personality. 'Ragamalika,' a Tamoul song, by Maurice Delage, is a melody of a rather uniform character and tonality. It pleased, and but for its length would have won more applause. Vittorio Rieti is a new-comer into our musical world. His Concerto for wind instruments and orchestra made an advantageous impression by its frankness and its well-established tonality. Rieti's intuition rarely fails in catching an accent of sincerity, even when themes and rhythms are used that betray no particular originality. He is a born musician. Casella's 'Elegia Eroica' and Caplet's 'Epiphanie' are items familiar to all, and need no special commentary. In the latter composition Maurice Maréchal performed the strenuous violoncello part with masterly art. M. Straram's conducting was musical, convincing, and very conscientious.

VIENNA

THE OPERATIC SITUATION

The economic crisis which has been affecting Vienna's operatic life for many months (apart from the artistic crisis which had been in existence for much longer) has reached its culminating point. No doubt this is to some extent the outcome of the general situation which has gradually enforced the bankruptcy and closing-down of no less than eight of Vienna's theatres, but in a much larger degree is brought about by the palpably inartistic methods of Vienna's opera-houses. The Staatsoper, for instance, had been left in a deplorable state at the departure of Richard Strauss, whose régime had slowly but surely effected a complete desintegration of that once famous ensemble. Director Schalk has been struggling manfully to put things in order again, but his heroic efforts did not fully succeed, either in re-establishing at once the lost morale of the company or in finding a remedy for the poor attendance caused by the economic depression of the country—or, indeed, in competing with the much higher gold mark salaries which have done so much towards luring many of Vienna's best artists to the German opera-houses.

The Volksoper has remained closed for more than six weeks, its latent insolvency having finally resulted in complete bankruptcy. The ultimate closing of this popular playhouse was largely due to passive resistance from the members, and particularly from the orchestra. The larger part of the players, and several of the singers, have found shelter in Rainer Simons's novel enterprise, a Chamber Opera, established in the theatre of the ex-Imperial Castle of Schönbrunn. This new venture, which was opened with the first local production of Handel's 'Xerxes,' has proved a sad disappointment, and the performance of 'The Tales of Hoffmann' revealed even more clearly the fact that the methods of Rainer Simons, which were such a great artistic success at the Volksoper fifteen and more years ago, have since become obsolete and distinctly provincial.

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

It was interesting to observe Wilhelm Furtwängler as conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on its recent visit to Vienna, and to compare its work with that of our own orchestras. The Berlin Philharmonic, founded as far back as 1882, had for years been directed by the late Arthur Nikisch. It ranks second among the Berlin orchestras, and may therefore be compared, not with the Vienna Philharmonic but with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. If the French players are supreme in the wood-wind, it may not be claiming too much to say that the Austrians are supreme in the strings. The brilliance, warmth, and beauty of the string sections of the Viennese orchestras was not even approached by the Berlin guests, nor is the splendid enthusiasm of the Viennese players rivalled by the Berliners. Instead, the Germans showed a precision—a genuinely Teutonic drill—which could not be found in a Viennese organization where collaboration with the conductor and individual work are more firmly rooted than German 'subordination.' The rigid and unconditional discipline of the Berlin players produced a fine reading of Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Prelude, but created a cool impression in such typically Viennese and sensuous music as Haydn's G major Symphony. Viennese swing and grace, on the other hand, gave pleasure unalloyed when Bruno Walter appeared at the head of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra for an evening of true Viennese music ranging from Schubert to Waltzes of Lanner and Johann Strauss. In stooping to these seemingly popular pieces, Bruno Walter honoured the masters of Viennese folk-music and also himself.

National music in a similar sense was Béla Bartók's Rhapsody for pianoforte and orchestra, which Tibor Szatmari, the Hungarian pianist, performed at one of the Workers' Concerts. (These concerts are given at regular intervals for the benefit of the poorer class, and have helped to found the fame of many great conductors, among them Furtwängler.) The Rhapsody—Bartók's Op. 1—is a piece of brilliant and grateful pianistic music in one movement, consisting of two slow sections interrupted by a brisk dance strain. It reveals Bartók as an advanced descendant of Liszt in the vigour of his music, if not superior to his great ancestor in a sincerity which shuns effect for its own sake. The same concert brought a significant novelty, the maiden composition of Julius Toldi, entitled 'Wanderskizzen.' The history of the composer is a rather romantic one; he went from the workshop of a local tailor to the studio of Arnold Schönberg, who discovered and fostered his talent. 'Wanderskizzen' is a variation work, though not one in the traditional sense of the word. A theme from Bartók's 'Rumanian Folk-Songs' is subjected to deft treatment in nine short movements, reflecting as many nations and landscapes. The rather obsolete variation form is thus invested with a new significance, and the entire piece, though in a sense national music, yet takes a broadly human and cosmopolitan view.

NEW CHAMBER MUSIC

The last two concerts of the Austrian section of the International Society for Contemporary Music proved the most interesting of the season, and furnished a certain contrast to those which had gone before. Of all sections of the Society, the Austrian group alone seems to adhere to what would seem to be the foremost duty of this organization, i.e., to produce not so much works which fall in with the ordinary concert scheme, but contemporary music of the unusual and problematic kind which would not easily be included in the routine programmes of concertizing artists. In part, at least, the last two concerts deviated from this rule to go to the other extreme. The Dance Suite, Op. 20, for pianoforte solo, by Wilhelm Grosz, the talented young Viennese, derived its sole merit from the excellent pianistic feat of the composer. For the rest it is of the same superficial brilliancy which is the fundamental note of Grosz's output. It says little, but speaks in the smooth and polished manner which impresses those hearers who cherish a predilection for finished drawing-room music. Witty, too, but with a touch of real humour, was Vittorio Rieti's Sonata for flute, oboe, bassoon, and pianoforte (also played by the composer himself). Replete with clever harmonic twists from major to minor key, and coloured by some Stravinskian burlesque in the use of wind instruments, the Sonata, with its parodied operatic trivialities and flash-lights from Italian street life, is an unassuming but decidedly amusing piece. Mario Labroca's String Quartet was the first composition of this young Italian to be heard at Vienna. It is short and brisk, if none too original, but it suffers from a predilection for 'obstinate' phrases that create monotony without redeeming the occasional lack of invention. The masterpiece of the evening was Alfredo Casella's Concertino for four strings, which proved rich in rhythmic contrast and full of atmosphere in its slow portion, and by far the best thing which we have heard from the Italian maestro. Its spontaneity is refreshing, and even where polytonal treatment and intricate rhythms are employed—as in the third movement, where the first violin, in 3/4 time, soars above the 4/4 rhythms of its companion—the texture is extremely lucid, and nothing laboured remains. Malipiero's 'Quattro Sonetti del Burchiello,' for voice and pianoforte, which profited from the accompaniment of Casella himself, were grateful but of small interest.

Amid such generally melodious and cheerful compositions, Anton von Webern, the Viennese modernist, alone represented the gloomy and sombre element, with his Songs, Op. 3, based on poems from Stefan George's 'Der dritte Ring.' In these numbers Webern again paints his predominantly lyrical moods not with broad strokes of the brush but with soft pastel outlines that yet betray a comparative virility and emotional strength hitherto unknown in this composer. Quite a different sort of lyricism prevailed in Albert Roussel's Sonata, Op. 11, for violin and pianoforte—a tunefulness which accrues from Franck, and is probably explained by Roussel's training as a pupil of Vincent d'Indy. The Sonata, apparently an earlier work, is rather colourless and sweetish, and tame to a degree when placed beside Béla Bartók's Hungarian National Songs (beautifully sung by that eminently musical soprano, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek). Bartók, ardent student of Hungarian folk-music, draws upon the resources of Magyar national songs, and, while re-shaping their musical outlines and providing them with an interesting background, yet does not divest them of their primitive originality—as Brahms has done in his far-famed 'Gypsy Songs,' where truth is often sacrificed to vocal and pianistic brilliancy. The stanza form is preserved, and enhances the simple style of these songs, each of which moves within a small compass of notes.

PAUL BECHERT.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

GEORGE SHINN, at Brixton, on June 5. By his death, in his eighty-ninth year, there has passed away a link with the musical past which now seems far distant. Born in 1837, he had outlived most of his contemporaries and many of the next generation. He was a pupil of E. J. Hopkins at the Temple Church when Hopkins was a comparatively young man. In 1864 he was one of the competitors (another being the late Sir Frederick Bridge) for the post of organist at St. Luke's, Old Street, then being vacated by Henry Smart for St. Pancras Church. In 1872, upon the recommendation of Sir John Goss, he went to St. Matthew's, Brixton, when Brixton was almost on the borders of the country. On leaving Brixton Church he became organist of Christ Church, Gipsy Hill; but for many years previous to his death he had not held an appointment. He would recall with enthusiasm the extemporaneous playing of Goss at St. Paul's in his preludes to the anthems, and the fine solo-playing of Best at the Panopticon in Leicester Square, and of George Cooper at St. Sepulchre's, Holborn. He sang under Costa in the old Sacred Harmonic Society and also in the early Handel Festivals at the Crystal Palace. He lived a quiet but very industrious life, teaching, and composing music of many kinds. Until about twelve months ago, when his sight began seriously to fail, nothing gave him greater pleasure than to attend the Sunday afternoon services at the Temple or Westminster Abbey, and although nearer ninety than eighty years of age he would walk the greater part of the way from his house at Stockwell, where he had lived for over forty years.

W. B. REYNOLDS, at Belfast, on May 29. He was born at Coleraine, and in early life showed marked musical ability. He did a good deal of composition in the departments of choral and light dramatic music, but found his real vocation as a music critic and writer on the art. In this capacity he served the Belfast Telegraph with distinction for twenty years. His death is a severe loss to musical journalism in Ireland.

BÉLA SZEPESSY, the eminent violin maker, at Schruns, Vovarlberg, Tyrol, on April 8. He was born in 1856, and had lived and worked in London for over forty years. Ill-health last winter compelled him to seek a kindler climate, but a sudden heart attack supervened, and he was found dead in bed.

Miscellaneous

We frequently give reports of the musical happenings at the larger public schools. Here is a note on the work at a smaller school, of which most readers have probably never heard—Dauntsey, near Devizes. At a recent concert by the school musical society, a fine programme was given, with Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and Charles Wood's 'Lochinvar' as chief choral works, and on the instrumental side Haydn's 'London' Symphony and 'Toy' Symphony, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and solos by Bach, Beethoven, and Schumann. The smaller choral items included Charles Wood's 'Expectans expectavi,' and part-songs and arrangements by Dyson, Whittaker, Morley, Herbert Hughes, Stanford, &c. This is a notable feat, for Dauntsey has had a music-master for only two years. The number of boys is a little over a hundred, some of them being day-boys; sixty sang in the choral society, and every member of the staff helped, either in the choir or orchestra. Bravo! and more power to the elbow of Mr. J. A. Davison, the music-master. This is the kind of communal activity that counts. Incidentally, we remark that Wiltshire is often described as an unmusical area. The fact is, of course, no part of the country is unmusical if it has a few enthusiastic teachers and leaders to collect the material and set it on fire.

Two £40 Scholarships, offered by the Trustees of the Mitchell Charity, are vacant at the Guildhall School of Music, Victoria Embankment, E.C.4. The winners of these must be, or their parents must have been, born or educated or employed within the limits of the City of London extending from Temple Bar in the west to Aldgate in the east, and from Moorgate to Southwark, north and south, of the city respectively. This is an unusual opportunity for City people to obtain first-class free musical education for their children. Applicants should address Mr. H. Saxe Wyndham, secretary.

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

HICK SCORNER.—You will have some difficulty in finding incidental music for a series of morality plays written in the 14th century. There is, of course, plenty of plainsong, simple and elaborate, from which you can help yourself. Outside this, you had better not attempt to be too exact in the matter of date. We should use any old songs or vocal music, such as 'Sumer is icumen in' (in the original version, of course) and the 'Agincourt Song.' The difficulty is that hardly any music is published in easily-accessible editions of an earlier date than the 16th century. As you have a few strings and wood-wind, you might include such old string music as the Suite by Giles Farnaby, edited by Bantock (Novello), or Byrd's 'The leaves be greene,' edited by Terry (Curwen). If we knew the subjects of your morality plays we might be able to make a few suggestions. For example, if one deals with the Nativity, you could of course make use of some mediæval Christmas Carols, of which plenty are available in good editions. You need not scruple in some cases to use a good modern setting of old words. This leads to the natural suggestion that you might find some modern settings of words by poets of the period, or nearly so. With so slender a store of material to draw upon, you must be prepared to be elastic in your choice. Thanks to the recent revival and interest in the Modes, there are now many excellent part-songs, anthems, hymn-tunes, and organ pieces written strictly in these old scales, and a good deal of this material would fall in with your scheme. So long as you avoid bad music, or music that has no kind of antique flavour, you need not worry about anachronisms in the matter of date.

R. D. S.—You say you are a good pianist, but not a good sight-reader, and you have the ambition to become an orchestral pianist. We presume you mean a pianist who plays with orchestras at theatres and such like. The best preparation for this is an improvement of your sight-reading and musicianship generally. You ask how you can become a better sight-reader. There is no royal road. You must simply practise playing at sight all kinds of unfamiliar music, remembering that a good sight-reader never stops, no matter what mistakes he makes. If you cannot play the music as written, you must adapt it to your technical and other resources as you go along. Often you will be able to do little more than give a kind of sketch of the score. What are you to omit? Obviously, you must keep your bass going, even if you simplify it; and as much of the main theme and subsidiary themes as possible must find a place in the sketch. But, whatever you do, remember that the result must, however slight and incomplete, be musical and rhythmical. This will never be achieved if you develop the habit-bad sight-readers have of constantly halting to correct mistakes. The rhythm must be kept going whatever happens to some of the notes en route.

MUSIC.—The shake is certainly indispensable. And if you mean to make a living by playing the violin you will have to master something more difficult than the shake and the fifth position. Your letter suggests—correctly or incorrectly—slight experience of music, and is, accordingly, difficult to answer adequately. If you have thoroughly mastered the fifth position, then the obvious next step for you is to tackle the sixth. And if you are on familiar terms with double-stopping, Campagnoli's 'Sept Divertissements,' every one of which is in a different position, would help you. But the fact that you have never practised a shake would seem to imply that you are still some way from the more difficult problems of technique. There is no reason why you should go to a specialist in order to learn so elementary a thing as the trill. You can find all you need in Kreutzer's Studies, and until you have mastered these somehow, you may find it difficult to obtain a place even in a picture-house. But of course an expert's advice may be very useful to you; and in the meantime you should take every opportunity to hear music, and to take part—no matter in how modest a capacity—in musical performances.

A.R.C.M.—Your scheme—an evening of folk-song of various nations—is embarrassingly comprehensive. In addition to practising the folk-song arrangements of Vaughan Williams your young people might also take some of those of Irish airs by Stanford, for S.A.T.B. (Curwen). For solo and unison choir performance consult the collection of Cecil Sharp (Novello). The Folk-Song Society recently brought out a number of its Journal dealing entirely with Manx folk-songs (see April Musical Times, p. 335). For pianoforte duets include one or two of the Slavonic Dances of Dvorák. We cannot help you in regard to Breton and Scandinavian arrangements. For your curiously compounded little orchestra, you might be able to adapt some of Grieg's 'Norwegian Dances,' Op. 35, or the Symphonic Dances, Op. 64. The former are for orchestra, the second for string orchestra. Instead of naming separate books, we suggest you should consult the article 'Song' in 'Grove,' where you will find the folk-songs of different countries dealt with exhaustively, and also guidance as to books.

ORGANIST.—(1.) Pergolesi's 'Stabat Mater,' for female voices, is issued with English words (Novello). (2.) There is very little organ music by the composers you mention, and not much to be had in the way of arrangements. In John E. West's series of 'Old English Organ Music,' there is a Voluntary by Orlando Gibbons, issued along with one by Matthew Locke, and a Toccata by John Blow; and also a couple of Voluntaries in A and D minor by Gibbons, issued together. Novello's have just published an arrangement by Mr. West of Gibbons's 'Fantazia of Foure Parts.' A book of ten pieces by Gibbons has been published by Chesters; and vols. 4 & 5 of the complete keyboard works of Gibbons (Stainer & Bell), edited by Margaret H. Glyn, are devoted to organ music. It should be added that the music of these two volumes is printed on two staves, and that some of it is not, strictly speaking, organ music, as it was designed also for playing on the virginals. We can trace no organ music or arrangements of pieces by Tallis, Byrd, or Child.

E. B. P.—(1.) The organ stops placed on heavy wind are, of course, the more powerful reeds. As to which manual is on heavy wind depends upon the stops it contains.

(2.) We know nothing of the pressures of the R.C.M. organ. Write to the builders, Messrs. J. W. Walker, 27, Francis Street, London. (3.) It is impossible to say whether an 8-ft. horn on the Swell is of 'trombone quality.' We have heard some 8-ft. horns, on old instruments, whose tone cannot be imitated by any instrument of the orchestra, we are glad to say. Very often your best organ imitation of brass tone will be got, not from stops labelled after brass instruments but from certain kinds of flue-work and diapasons. (4.) We have not the syllabuses of the A.R.C.M. and L.R.A.M. Organ Playing examinations at hand, so cannot compare their score-reading and other tests with those of the F.R.C.O. We believe one or two of the examiners at the R.C.O. also officiate occasionally at the A.R.C.M. and L.R.A.M. organ examinations.

G. S. M.—(1.) We do not undertake the fingering and return through the post of lengthy passages such as you enclose. (2.) By 'Wagner's later works for pianoforte solo' we presume you mean transcriptions of the later operas. Wagner wrote no pianoforte music that we know of, save an early piece or two. We have examined various editions of pianoforte arrangements and vocal scores of the operas, but have found none fingered. (3.) We think your needs as to independence of the hands and improvement of left-hand technique would be met by Books 10 to 13 of Franklin Taylor's 'Progressive Studies' (left hand), Book 53 (exercises for the weaker fingers), Book 55 (exercises for independence of the fingers), and Book 56 (preliminary studies for polyphonic playing). These are all published by Novello, at 1*s.* 6*d.* per book. But we need hardly say that what matters most is not the book you use, but the amount of thought and hard work you put into your practice.

ROLAND.—You should have little difficulty in playing on a strange pianoforte. You say that your technique, even in a familiar piece, 'goes scat' when you attempt to play on an unfamiliar instrument. As you admit that the difficulty is not brought about by differences of touch, it is evidently a matter of nerves. We can only suggest that you should play on as many unfamiliar pianofortes as possible, and so accustom yourself to the ordeal—which, after all, is a flea-bite compared with what organ recitalists have to undergo! So pull yourself together, and adopt a kind of Coué formula, reminding yourself that every day and in every way you are getting better and better able to deal with strange pianofortes.

T. H.—It is possible, but not probable, that you might learn to play the violin 'without actual personal instruction, but by books.' You should begin by having a few lessons from a good teacher, so that you will at least start on sound lines as regards holding the instrument, bowing, &c. A good, keen musician, thus grounded, can no doubt make very fair progress afterwards by working 'on his own' from books. If you adopt this plan, get your teacher to recommend books suitable for self-study.

WORTHING.—(1.) All inquiries concerning the Haslemere Chamber Music Festival should be addressed to Mrs. Arnold Dolmetsch, 'Jesses,' Haslemere, Surrey. (2.) We understand there is to be no Summer School of Church Music this year.

S. V. S.—We know of no volume of concert programme annotations. Does anybody? There seems to be a need for such a work, if we may judge from the number of inquiries we receive.

SUCCESS.—All technical material used in the Matthay Method can be obtained from the Tobias Matthay Pianoforte School, 95 & 96, Wimpole Street, W.1.

MOTHS IN THE PIANOFORTE

SIR,—If 'Insecty' ties a few balls of napthalene in a small muslin bag and puts them anywhere inside his pianoforte, no moths or any other insect will come near. Moths from an evergreen hedge, even if they did come in (which is improbable), would not hurt a pianoforte. The moths that might do harm by laying their eggs on the felt portions of the action, which the caterpillars would feed on, are the Tineæ, or small moths, which, as a rule, live in houses, and whose caterpillars feed on various waste woollen substances and do considerable damage if neglected. If 'Insecty' has these in his house he had better waste no time in getting rid of them by burning all the articles they have attacked.—Yours, &c.,

Richmond, Yorks. (Rev.) T. P. LEVETT (Fellow, Entomological Society of London).

Mr. HENRY T. CHENNELL, John Street, Ryde, Isle of Wight, wishes to know where he can procure a copy of Ouseley's Collection of Anthems by various composers, vols. 1 or 2, formerly published by Novello. If this inquiry produces no result, we suggest to Mr. Chennell that he should write to the best-known second-hand music sellers, such as Harold Reeves, Shaftesbury Avenue, William Reeves, Charing Cross Road, and Foyle's, Charing Cross Road.

'WENGE' writes thanking various correspondents for answers to his question on the history of hymn-tunes.

THE ADAPTABILITY OF DOUBLE CHANTS

SIR,—Has it occurred to those of your readers who are interested in Anglican chants, that many double chants contain a single one? This fact, if made use of, entirely does away with the difficulty of odd verses; also, by using the double and single chant alternatively, it enables a double chant to be used as a triple one.

In those psalms where there are sometimes groups of equal and unequal verses (see Psalms 15, 66, 56, 39, 96, 146, in 'The Paragraph Psalter,' by Dr. Westcott), by using either the double or single form of the chant as required, the objection, so often made against double chants—of the wrong half of a chant commencing a paragraph—is entirely removed. It saves the monotony of having to use a single, or what Sir Herbert Oakeley (?) not inaptly termed 'a half-chant,' for so many long psalms.

In practice, all that is necessary is to draw a bracket over the omitted portions of the double chant, as in the subjoined example, and to teach the choir both single and double forms:

OLD ENGLISH VIOLIN MUSIC

EDITED BY

ALFRED MOFFAT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

Although considerable attention has been given to the resuscitation of Church Music, Glees and Madrigals, Organ and even Harpsichord Music by the older English composers, very little has been done to make known the large mass of music for the Violin written by English musicians from the time of Purcell to the close of the 18th century. These works for the most part consist of Suites or Sonatas written for a solo violin with a figured bass, or for two violins and violoncello with a figured bass for the harpsichord or organ; another favourite form was the Concerto grosso.

It is with the object of making known to the public a selection of the best of these compositions that the present series has been undertaken. ALFRED MOFFAT.

AT THE BOAR'S HEAD

A MUSICAL INTERLUDE IN ONE ACT

THE LIBRETTO TAKEN FROM

SHAKESPEARE'S KING HENRY IV.

THE MUSIC, FOUNDED ON OLD ENGLISH MELODIES, BY

GUSTAV HOLST

(OP. 42).

PIANOFORTE ARRANGEMENT BY VALLY LASKER.

Vocal Score, Price Six Shillings — Libretto, One Shilling

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

THE TIMES—April 4, 1925

". . . . The dialogue moves almost at speaking pace; the tunes appear so easily that not one in ten of them would be recognised as a quotation (Holst owns to about forty borrowed tunes) if he had not shown his hand in a printed preface. The orchestration is another point of subtle interest. It is generally inconspicuous, almost always light enough to let the voice come through without effort. It never distracts attention from the play, yet Holst's skill appears in the way he clothes the thinnest harmonic outline with apt colour."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH—April 4, 1925

". . . . The generous use Mr. Holst has made of Old English melodies garnered from the Playford, Chappell, and Cecil Sharp collections. . . . Whatever its constituents this music adds zest and momentum to the comic scenes; it rises to dignity and eloquence in the noble monologue of Prince Henry; it sets in relief every element of the last episode where the love passages of Falstaff and Doll are broken off by war alarms. . . . . The individuality of the composer emerges clear and distinct, binding together firmly the action. It is a personality compounded of great daring and great simplicity; of a modern love for sharp, slick combination of harmony and an innate bias for the song that is the people's heritage. One might almost think of Holst as a master of the Tudor period who during the eras of German hegemony in music has lain in enchanted sleep, and awakened again in the twentieth century to resume his song making with modern tools."

DAILY MAIL—April 4, 1925

". . . . This original and exquisite little score . . . . It was no foolhardiness but a sound instinct that prompted the addition of this music to the richest and wittiest comedy scenes that ever came from pen of man. Mr. Holst's music is woven on material from the Old English country dance book. The small orchestra keeps these slight and blithe tunes chattering or murmuring, and above it the words are fitted in a rare new manner. The fine ingeniousness of it all can be judged from the score."

THE MORNING POST—April 4, 1925

". . . . More than half of the problem which Mr. Holst has set himself has been the mating of a certain text with a certain body of tune without doing violence to either. He has succeeded, and now that the job has been done one sees how inevitable is his solution of a difficult problem, and with what extraordinary skill it has been accomplished. . . . . The real feat of the composer has been the apparent ease with which he has brought words and music together, and has allowed free play to the Shakespearean text, while adding a covering of music as delightful as it is pertinent. . . . . The curtain is Shakespeare's, but it is also Mr. Holst's in an admirably effective page of his score. In his new opera he shows again his sense of theatrical effect, both in the ingenuity with which he has arranged this episode, and in the use he makes of his orchestra."

DAILY NEWS—April 4, 1925

". . . . Mr. Holst's method of composition is decidedly new. He has taken over forty English folk-songs, and used them as the principal element of the score, besides tunes of his own. The folk-songs are developed, combined, and transformed with surprising ingenuity."

THE SUNDAY TIMES—April 5, 1925

". . . . The melody that Mr. Holst has invented for them [the Sonnets], beautifully free in rhythm, and remote in style yet without a suspicion of archaism, seems a natural emanation from them. His technical skill is shown in the masterly combination of this song ['Devouring Time'], later with the 'King Arthur' ballad, in a little ensemble that comes just at the right moment. One is astonished at the general congruity between Shakespeare's words and the traditional tunes."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN—April 4, 1925

". . . . 'At the Boar's Head' is a work of genius, if only for its cleverness and the masterly way in which the words of Shakespeare are made to run in with the old and strongly rhythmical melodies of Shakespeare's own time. It is a work of genius also because it answers to the geniality of Shakespeare. . . . Mr. Holst should in this work have made friends with the man in the street."

THE PERFECT FOOL

OPERA IN ONE ACT

WORDS AND MUSIC BY

GUSTAV HOLST

OP. 39

PRICE ... ... SIX SHILLINGS

Libretto One Shilling

THE BALLET FROM "THE PERFECT FOOL"

Full Score, 15s.; Pianoforte Solo, 3s.; Pianoforte Duet, 4s.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

THE TIMES

The ballet music . . . is the most brilliant thing in a work glittering with brilliant moments. . . . There is one delicious musical moment, an almost Purcellian "round" for three voices. . . . and it is not an isolated moment.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH

It is a safe and a proud thing to say that in the whole history of opera no composer has produced a more perfectly fitting score and libretto than Gustav Holst has produced in this opera. . . . In very truth this is a perfect little opera, a veritable masterpiece after its kind, of wit and humour. . . . Brilliantly clever and amusing.

THE MORNING POST

The Perfect Joke would be a better title for Mr. Holst's opera. . . . Mr. Holst shows the rare and precious ability to make a musical joke that everyone can see—or hear. . . . The whole thing is something entirely fresh, and follows a well-defined line of its own. . . . Actually there is not a weak page in the score, and though story and music differ from the expected, the way they are handled with originality and power constitute the opera a little masterpiece.

THE DAILY MAIL

The Perfect Fool . . . ought to have a sweeping success if musical people can command enough sense of humour and if people of humour have ears open to the splendour of the music. . . . Splendid music, and playfully mocking, allusive, fantastic libretto. . . . And there are numbers of first-rate tunes—for Holst is a prime melodist.

DAILY NEWS

It will appeal strongly to musicians all over the world who are familiar with operatic literature.

DAILY EXPRESS

His rhythmical capacity serves him extremely well in the ballet music, which is, indeed, some of the best that has been written in opera for a long time.

REFEREE

A ballet of such originality and interest, accompanied by such masterly music, that interest was excited and admiration aroused. . . . Musically this ballet is the finest portion of the work. . . . The instrumentation is a marvel of suggestion and humour.

PALL MALL GAZETTE

Holst has provided excellent entertainment in company with some remarkably good music. The latter is rich in the two essentials of tune and rhythm. . . . There are many tunes—the Wizard's "Wooing Song," for example—which are so simple and accessible that one is unconsciously whistling them after a single hearing. . . . There are many gems. The ballet-music, of course, is fairly well known by now, but the "Round" of the three girls fetching water was a charming moment, and the unaccompanied chorus towards the end a piece of real virtuosity.

DAILY CHRONICLE

A brilliant little fantasy. . . . The ballet music is most effective, particularly the exquisite Dance of the Spirit of Water.

BIRMINGHAM POST

Highly diverting in a vein entirely its own. . . . Plain, pure, unbending Holst from beginning to end, the writing masterly in its directness, and the scoring amazingly pointed and suggestive.

WESTERN DAILY PRESS

We may reasonably hope that Mr. Holst's all too short opera will take its place permanently in that small but brilliant constellation of comic-operas on the grand scale of which The Mastersingers and The Marriage of Figaro are the bright particular stars.

MUSICAL NEWS AND HERALD

The Perfect Fool is the finest piece of real musical humour that has appeared for a long time.

THE MUSICAL STANDARD

The Perfect Fool is the best thing Holst has given us. . . . Themes of quite extraordinary beauty, arresting to the ear, and haunting the memory even after a first hearing.

SUNDAY TIMES

Indeed, he has performed a notable feat of alchemy. He has taken of the common objects of opera, grown hoary and wearisome in service, and accomplished, with enharmonic subtlety, their transmutation and combination into something new and significant.

"It was very much wanted, and now that it has arrived it proves to be the best book on the subject we have ever seen. . . . One would like to dwell lovingly on every stage of this monumental work did space permit, but it will only allow of a general commendation of every word from the beginning . . . to the end, which consists of music to accompany the rhythmic physical exercises."—The Morning Post, February 17, 1922.

"No teacher of singing should be without this wonderful book."—Musical Opinion.

"This is a thoughtful and thought-compelling book which touches life at most points. Eurhythm the author defines as perfect harmony, and discusses with a fine enthusiasm the practical means of bringing about in the individual this desirable condition. The book should be of great value to teachers of singing and physical education, while the intelligent student can also derive great benefit from a careful reading."—Glasgow Herald.

HENRY PURCELL

(1658-1695?)

CHACONY

QUARTET FOR STRINGS

IN G MINOR.

Transcribed from the Original Manuscript in the British Museum and Edited by HANNAH BRYANT.

PRICE, PARTS, 4*s.* NET.
MINIATURE SCORE, 1*s.* NET.

Purcell's "Chacony" for four string instruments is now published, as far as is ascertainable, for the first time, the original being included in the manuscript volume of Fantasias, &c., at the British Museum. This little work is an admirable example of Purcell's genius, illustrating, as it does, his fondness for a "ground" and for a strong second beat in triple time, his choice of a minor key, and his use of bold harmonies and occasional false relations which strike even the modern hearer as almost disconcertingly daring. Contrapuntally the work is of the greatest interest, but at no time does the ingenious weaving of the texture obscure the emotional quality of the music, which is inspired from the first note to the last. At moments, as when the "ground" is transferred to an upper part, it is of ethereal beauty.
